Gen. Ord's Death.

NEW YORK, Special Telegram, July 26.—The captain of the steamer City of Washington, which arrived here yesterday, gives the following account of Gen. Ord's illness and death:

On Monday Gen. Ord began to look ill. Poor general he was an extremely sick man, although he would not acknowledge it. He fought the disease bravely, but without avail. I asked him if he was not pretty sick, but he said: "No, it's only the rheumatism." Yet I saw that he was getting worse. When we reached Havana, for which I made all possible haste, and where we arrived July 18, I sent for Dr. Burgess of the hospital, who, it proved, had been on Gen. Ord's staff during the war. He told me that the general had "got it," and we finally induced the old soldier to go to the hospital, although he fought against the proposal. We gained his consent only by saying that in two or three days we should go to sea and then he would go on board again. I never retreated before, said the general, but it looks as though I had to go this time. You know the rest.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, AUG. 2

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmadge will lecture on "Big Blunders," in Ericsson's Hall, August 21st. [14-16]

The way that Houston & Co. are shipping out the Self-binders does not look like the farmers anticipate very short crops this year. They have been kept on the jump, loading up machines for a week past and still the rush continues.

The Chicago Advance says: "We found ourselves in Dr. Talmage's immense audience room, containing seats for 5,000 persons. When the exercises began, not a foot of standing or sitting room was anpwhere visible. Here were crowds flocking to hear the most plain and pungent preaching on the old theme of gospel salvation." Dr. Talmage lectures in Ericsson's Hall, Aug. 21st.

Mrs. Jas. Kelley and Miss Nellie Stevens have opened a dressmaking establishment in I. U. Jennings' building, opposite the JOURNAL office, where they are prepared to welcome the ladies of Crookston and vicinity and to do all kinds of dressmaking in the latest styles of the art. They keep constantly on hand all of the latest patterns and cordially invite the ladies to call and see them.

The LaCrosse Daily Chronicle says of Sullivan's Mirror of Ireland comedy company, which is to appear Friday evening, August 3d, at Ericsson's Hall:

"Last night Sullivan's comedy company presented the Mirror of Ireland to an appreciative audience. The program was carried out strictly as advertised, and the several performers were all good in their parts. Sullivan doubled on various characters and was equally funny either as an Irishman or a Dutchman, and was frequently applauded, and love-making ruses in the scenes with his sweetheart, Nora, being very well rendered indeed. Miss Josie Sullivan, in Irish songs and charter acting did some original acting which was well received, as were also Miss Annie Mortimer and Mr. W. A. White in their different renditions. Wm. Wells, the ventriloquest, was most excellent in his imitations, and he always left the stage amid the applause of the audience. hhe scenery was shown at intervals throughout the performance, and some of it was good and some really grand, the moonlight effects, imitation of storms on the coast, etc., being particularly fine. All who enjoy the humorous should not fail to see Mr. Sullivan in 'Muldoon, the Solid Man.'"

County News.

Red Lake Fallss Doings.

From the Messenger.

John Kahler is now living the life of a retired merchant.

Gerke & Brunner are delivering the brick for the veneering of Kretzschmar's block. When completed it will be one of the finest blocks in Polk County.

The wife of Edward Garceau departed this life Wednesday morning. She has been sick for some time and was thought to be much better until the morning of the day she died.

The dam is progressing rapidly. Already it is nearly half way across the river, and from appearances we should judge that the "mighty floods of centuries" could not wash it away.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Two of the government's police stationed at White Earth were up here on Friday last looking over the logs purchased by Crocker & Cundy from Indian chief Moosedung. They said they had received information that the Indians had been cutting green timber, but were satisfied from what they saw that eveayihing was al O. K.

Of all the pleasant parties given in St. Hilaire, the one given by the Misses. Mix, at their residence, on Saturday evening last stands at the head. A large number of young married and single people from town drove out and spent a couple of hours in a most delightful manner. The music was good, the ice-cream and cake was better and the Indian war dance was best of all.

Mr. W. S. Morse received a letter, last evening from F. Z. Sherwood, of Faribault, informing him that a couple of car loads of lumber had been shipped to St. Hilaire and instructing him to commence at once the erection of a large store building for him. The building is to be put up on the vacant lot between Ashall's hardware store and Strom's saloon and, we understand, is to be 25x60 feet and two stories high.

Burt Wells, the dandy clerk of the Commercial hotel, Crookston, paid a visit to our town yesterday. While here he purchased a birch bark canoe from the Indians and will show the Crookston people what he knows about navigation. Obituary notices 10 cents per line at this office.

Messrs. Geo. Campbell, Jas. Lee and R. C. Jones, of Morgan's addition went on an exploring expedition a short distance up Thief river, last week. They report a beautiful, well settled country, crops in good condition and the farmers happy. They took a boat up with them and came back by the river.

Just before going to press a severe wind and rain storm struck this part of the country. Berntson & Smidesang's large store building, in course of erection and almost completed was razed to the ground. No other damage was done either in the town or in the surrounding country so far as heard from. Berntson & Smidesang will commence at once putting their building up again.

Mr. Fritz Eikhoff has now opened up in Utzinger's hall his large stock of furniture, where until his building is completed his salesrooms will be located. Mr. Eikhoff's new building which is to be 20x40 feet, is being driven to completion as fast as good carpenters can do the work, and will soon be ready for occupancy. See his new ad in this issue.

Crocker & Cundy left yesterday for a trip to St. Paul and Minneapolis for the purpose of making arrangments with some mill men who think of putting in a large saw mill at this point. Their first drive of logs have all been taken out of the river and the second drive which consists of 800,000 feet of exclusively pine logs are on the way from Red Lake. There is a bonanza for a large saw mill here and C. & C. are bound to have one.

We have in our office to-day a sample of oats grown on the claim of Peterson Bros., situated about a mile and a half north of St. Hilaire, which measures 4 ft. 2 in., and the tops of which are so heavy with grain that the stalks will hardly hold them up. The Peterson boys sowed about ten acres of these oats on breaking, on the first day of June last and this sample is a fair representation of the whole field. It is estimated that they will harvest 70 bushels to the acre. Who says we will have poor crops in this part of the Valley?

Among the most prominent new arrivals at the European hotel this week was a young lady who came on Monday afternoon in full dress, and we will bet six cents to a yaller dog that in this whole northern tier there is not a happer man nor a prouder papa than Squire Robbecke. The little maiden weighs 11 pounds, has good strong lungs and is the first child born on Crocker, Cundy & Nelson's addition to St. Hilaire. The mother is doing well and the doctor says that with good care Charley may possibly survive.

The Times.

The crop has improved wonderfully since the rain.

Judfie Ives' new real estate office will soon be ready for occupancy.

Mr. Erickson from Crookston, is up making arrangements to start a livery stable.

Hon. B. Sampson and Mr. Dunlap was up from Crookston this weeke, and made a flying trip to Thief river.

R. Towler just brought in a specimen of wheat from his farm, the stalks of which are four feet and two inches long and the heads are over three inches long.

Fisher's Fancies

From the Bulletin.

We are informed that A. C. Clausen sold the remainder of his village property to L. C. McKnight.

W. W. Cornell of the Cornell farm, has returned from New York; and, after looking over his fields, is assured of the best crop he has had since he commenced work in the valley.

Our county board of equalization has seen proper to raise the assessed valuation of several properties in this vicinity. They also taxed the timber for the construction of the county bridge at Grand Forks. There is a fine distinction between a just and martinet assessment.

Still the river bridge is moving west from immense pressure of the vast dirt slide of the east approach. Low water seems to increase the damage, and it has become a foregone conclusion that the bridge most be moved. Mr. Nolan thinks however, that he can protect it untill ice bridge the river. He was in town on Wednesday and Thursday at work on the weakened end.

During the violent thunder storm of Tuesday night, lightning either struck or exploded over a shanty on section 14, town of Tynsid, occupied by Ole Oleson Fosback and family. The shock prostrated the mother and rendered insensible the other members of the family. On the following morning Dr. Lankester was summoned, he reports no sign of a lightning stroke on the person of a woman, there being great nervous prostration alone visible. He thinks the woman will recover.

Springer Harbaugh, Esq., returned from the Lockhart farm, which he is cultivating, on Saturday night. This farm is located in the famous Red River Valley, ten miles north of Ada, Norman County. He brought down samples of grain which are of the most encouraging character. One bunch is over four feet high and splendidly headed. Eight days ago the field from which it was taken did not have a stalk two feet out of the ground. The growth of the last eight days has been simply marvelous. All doubts of a crop have been removed and that section is sure of a good yield.—St. Paul Globe.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

County Commissioner Higdem reached here Saturday from Crookston. He will return to-day, as the board of equalization have not completed their labors. Some of the citizens of Polk County will open wide their eyes with astonishment when they learn that they are really better off than they thought they thought they were about the time the assessor made his rounds.

Thephus Earle, telegraph messenger in Grand Forks, attempted to ride one of the Dwyer Bros.' horses over from the Dakota side with nothing but a halter. When near the livery stable the horse took fright and threw him off. He fell on his head, and when picked up he was found to be insensible. After reviving somewhat he was driven over to the telegraph office. His head was badly bruised.

John S. Dwyer left yesterday for Medford, ostensibly for the purpose of looking after his claim. From private sources we learn that John is peculiarly and happily situated, being the posessor of two claims in the town of Garfield. One will require a residence of six months to get absolute possession of it, and the other—well, the time varies, depending more or less on the young man, and the amount of mild persuasion he may possess.

From private advices received at the Courier office we learn that Mrs Richard Gibbons, whose husband some time ago embarked in the saloon business in East Grand Forks, and now conducting a millinery shop in Waseca, Minn., has taken French leave of her husband and has gone where the woodbine twineth. Mr. Gibbons has started in hot pursuit, and if he should be so unfortunate as to overtake the fair Mrs. G. no doubt he will take her back to his home and press her to his bosom as one sinned against and not sinning. Oh! these men! these men!—and these women, too!

The storm on last Thursday evening was the severest known to the "oldest inhabitant," which has ever visited East Grand Forks. Between 6 and 7 o'clock huge banks of clouds commenced piling up from the southwest, followed by a perfect gale of wind, rain and hail, although the fall of hail was comparatively short. The heavens were streaked with forked and livid lightning, and the thunder roared and pealed forth with a rapidity which at times was perfectly grand. About 7:30 a sharp, loud peal was heard, as if something was struck. As soon as the storm abated, the Courier representative sallied forth and learned that considerable damage had been done. The lightning entered the real estate office of P. J. Duffy, and for a few moments took possession of the telephone instrument, ringing the bell at a fearful rate, but doing no damage further than beating the instrument. The saloon building of Mrs. Mary Franken was struck and the side of one room almost gutted. Mr. Franken and her family had a narrow escape as they were standing in the room at the time. The walls of of Captain Barton's brick block, which had been standing since the first of last spring, were razed to the ground. Masterson & Carroll's sign, which required the combined efforts of two negroes, three Norwegians and one Irishman to erect some few months ago was so completely shattered that not even the wreck remained; Hunt, Holt & Garner Bros., lumber yard was slightly injured. C. Madson had the front of his store more or less injured by the storm, and one of his clerks, Jas Craig was completely prostrated by a shock. A few miles east of town a large building, we were unable to learn the owner's name, was struck and entirely consumed by fire. But little or no damage was done to the crops.

The Big Fair.

Encouraging Indications From All Quarters—The Programme Outlined—The Stock That is Coming—Etc.

The Minneapolis fair which opens three weeks from Monday, gives promise of being a complete success. programme roughly outlined, is as follows:

Monday—Children's day.

Tuesday and Wednesday—Military tournament.

Thursday—Bicycle racing between champions of England and America.

Friday—State bicycle tourney. There will also be trotting, running, steeple chase and hurdle races each day.

Secretary Clark and his assistants are busily engaged in completing arrangements, and from the numerous advertising agents who are out on the road, the most encouraging reports are heard. D. C. Conkey writes from Fort Dodge that there will be a big representation from that section. Fry & Farbaugh, of York, Nebraska, write that they will have a big stock of Clyde and Norman horses on exhibition. A. G. Godwin, of Bement, Ill., writes for eight stalls for horses, and will arrive with them next week. Wallace Morse, of Verona, Wis., will have his herd of twenty Devons, the Stars of the Northwest." Other like reports come from various quarters.

At the grounds the work of fitting up is progressing rapidly, and a small army of laborers are employed. Over $6,000 have already been expended. The fair is bound to be a big success, and, especially in the horse and cattle line, will be the greatest show ever seen in the northwest.—Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The Argyle Banner says that A. J. Clark is seriously ill.

Mr. S. L. Dobson has commenced work on a brick store on Second street.

Mr. M. N. Berg was around on the streets Monday after a severe seige of typhoid fever.

Dr. Thoen, of Grand Forks was in the city on Friday last. He talks strongly of locating here.

Auditor McGuire's old clerk, Mr. Johnson, has returned and is employed in the Register's office.

"Ho for the thirteen townships," is the cry and hundreds who never hood before are now hoing to beat the dickens.

Mr. H. C. Johnson brought in a fine sample of wheat on Tuesday, which was 4½ feet high with long heads well filled.

And still the rush for lands in the thirteen townships continues unabated and bid fair to hold out until the last acre is taken.

Notice, the change in Buchanan's ad, and drop in to his establishment and see what he can do for you in the line of groceries.

Mr Robert Houston claims the honor of filing upon the first claim in the thirteen townships. He made his filing on Friday morning.

Jacob Stambaugh was up from his farm on the Sand hill River on Monday. He says he will commence cutting wheat this week.

Ike Leiderer, a traveling man from Milwukee, who last summer invested some shekels in Crookston dirt, was in the city this week.

Ira N. Underhill and his bride returned from their bridal trip on Monday and have settled down to housekeeping on Main Street.

The Brainard Dispatch has again changed hands—Publer steps down and out and N. W. Ingersoll and F. W. Wieland assume control. The change is evidently for the better.

Dept. Sheriff A. N. Hopkins and wife, and Mr. and Mrs. Beecher started for the thirteen townships on Saturday morning to get claims. They came back tanned equal to Chippewa braves on Wednesday.

The land office has been crowded every day this week. On Monday 170 entries were made, on Tuesday 125 and still the rush continues as great. At this rate the land in the thirteen townships will soon all be taken.

Grand Forke sent over a trotter on Monday to clean out the bald-headed charger of the prairie, Prof. Thompson's Garabaldi. The Prof. cooly raked in a $100 bill and remarks: "who's afraid? Give us a hard one!"

Thor. Haatvedt came in on Tuesday to file on his claim in the thirteen townships, and found that somebody had anticipated him. He takes it as a pre-emption and as he has already acquired sufficient improvement on the claim he will get the claim and the other fellow will get—left.

On Friday morning the President's order together with a letter of instructions to the U. S. Land office was received and at 2:30 the JOURNAL had an extra on the streets with newsboys shouting the glad tidings. The daily Tier did not (evidently) know any thing about it for several days afterwards—at least it did not mention it.

Arne Higdem was over on Monday looking into this thirteen township business. He has recently provided for the boarding of paupers at $2,50 per week that previously cost the County $5. He put in 52 filings for men who settled on the withdrawn lands two years ago. Speaking about these lands being thrown into market he said that too much credit could not be given to Paul Sletten who had worked incessantly for four years, even even when every body else had lost all faith in there being restored very soon. Arne is right about this.

Maj. C. P. Luse, Indian Agent at White Earth, called at our office on Monday, having come to the Land Office to file upon a piece of land in the withdrawn lands. He put the first pre-emption filing on a fine quarter of that dirt. In conversation with the Major he said that several years ago, when we met him in Chicago and told him of the beauties and glories of this Red River Valley he thought we were giving him taffy, or at least that we were putting it on pretty thick but, said he, I found, after I came to this country that you had not said one half enough about it, every thing exceeded your wildest talk and I am more than satisfied with it all since I have seen it "There is no grander country in the world than is found in your county of Polk and especially in that portion of it just opened to settlement.

Order your LaCrosse bear of Ole Bang.

Dennis Kelley, Dan Kelley and Jim Kelley have just returned from a trip to the withdrawn lands having secured a farm apiece of fine land.

Archie Campbell is putting down a well for the Peter Cornelius on Secton 12, Fairfax. On Saturday last they were down 100 feet with no signs of water yet.

Mr. Norby, of Lake Park, came in from the thirteen townships to-day, having secured a fine claim. He says the lands are overrun with Becker County men.

Frank Zarracher has rented the Merchants Billiard Hall of M. L. Fretts, who this evening goes below with her mother. Frank invites the boys to call around and see him often.

Mr. W. J. Troupe, of Battle Lake brother to the devel (in our office) put in appearance to day, on the war path for something to do in the garden part of the world. He is very favorably impressed with our country.

On Saturday last Ole Bang received a carload of the celebrated Michel's LaCrosse bottled beer which he will sell by the case or bottle. The La-Crosse beer has a reputation of its own and needs no recommend.

Ole Bjoin returned from the thirteen townships on Monday bring along samples of Scotch Fife wheat raised there. The heads were from five to six inches long well filled and among the finest we have ever seen in the county.

Ole P. Onstad told our reporter that the thirteen townships, just thrown in the market was the finest land he ever saw, having plenty of timber, grassland and the best water in the northwest. It is the Park Regon of Polk County.

Orders for LaCrosse Bottled beer promptly filled by Ole Bang.

Johannes Cornelius, brother of Peter and M. Cornelius of this city, arrived from the old country on Wednesday. He is a baker by trade and is on the lookout for a business opening. He is very favorably impressed with what he has seen and will locate here if he sees an opportunity.

Mr. and Mrs Kretzschmar were in the city and left for Minneapolis on Friday of last week where Mrs. Kretzschmar will remain under the doctor's care awhile. Her many friends here will unite in the hope of her speedy recovery.

Mr. J. W. Wheaten, foreman of the St. Hilaire Times, gave our office a call last week enroute below to secure a Government pension due him for faithful services in Uncle Sam's services. Mr. W. is one of the oldest and one of the best typos in the State of Minnesota and the Times is especially fortunate in having secured his services.

Henry Ward Beecher gave his great lecture on Evolution in the new Congregational church, on Wednesday evening, to a crowded house. Mr. Beecher consumed 2 hours and 30 minutes in skirmishing upon the shores of his subject gathering a few pearls of thought for the consideration of his audience while the vast sea of his subject lay beyond and untouched. Our pen is alltogether too impotent to give a faint idea of this speech and his manner so we shall not try it. You should have been there and heard it to comprehend it.

Some Tall Barley.

Mr. M. E. Bartlett brought in a sample of barley from the JOURNAL farm that is 4¼ feet high with heads from 4½ to six inches long. He has five acres of that kind of barley all due to thorough cultivation. Last year the land was planted to potatoes but being somewhat low and wet did not produce much, however he kept the land thoroughly cultivated; this spring he plowed it as deep as he could and an June 5th sowed it to barley. That five acres stands nearly twice as high as the rest of his barley surrounding it and will yield more than double we think.

Fergus Falls Daily Journal:—Great rejoicing is made at Crookston over an order from Washington restoring thirteen townships of valuable lands lying between the White Earth and Red Lake reservations. These lands were withdrawn from market four years ago, and made a part of the first named reservation, but they are now to be given to settlers, and as before remarked, Crookston is happy, as she has a right to be, for there is much pine there and mostly within reach of the waters of the Clearwater river.

Grand Forks Herald:—J. W. Howes, our popular lumber merchant, yesterday sold to C. B Rockwood, proprietor of the Keystone farm, 20,000 feet of lumber and 30,000 shingles. Fourteen wagons, some with four horses attached, hauled the lumber from the yard to Mr. Rockwood's farm. As soon as the lumber was loaded on to the wagons, the teams were all brought into line, and preparations made to photograph the outfit. As soon as it was noised around town what was going on about 150 of our citizens distributed themselves in conspicuous places on the loaded wagons, and had their pictures taken. The result was most startling. The first attempt broke the camera, but the second one proved satisfactory, and W. F. Sunderland, the photographer, says he never expects to take so many horses, mules and asses again together. The photograph can be seen at the post office.

THE DESERTED HOUSE.

Life and Thought have gone away
  Side by side,
  Leaving doors and windows wide—
Careless tenants they!
All within is dark as night;
In the windows is no light;
And no murmur at the door,
So frequent on its hinge before.
Close the door, the shutters close,
  Or through the windows we shall see
  The nakedness and vacancy
Of the dark deserted house.
Come away. No more of mirth
  Is here or merry-making sound
The house was built of the earth,
  And shall fall again to ground.
Come away—for Life and Thought
  Here no longer dwell;
  But in a city glorious—
A great and distant city—have bought
  A mansion incorruptible.
  Would they could have stayed with us!

—Alfred Tennyson.

HER ARISTOCRATIC WAYS.

You notice the title reads like an exclamation, and please imagine a very contemptuous tone of voice in conjunction with the exclamatory clause and you have it complete just as Aunt Phœbe put it.

I was spending the summer with auntie in the thrifty little town of N—— not far from the White Mountains, and its proximity to the refreshing mountainous region made it a popular resort for "summer boarders," a few of whom were annually accommodated at the ample farm house where I had delightedly taken up my abode for the "season."

My home was in an always retired New England village, and the bustle of a "summer campaign," in a for-the-time-being fashionable locality, was an experience of which I had long dreamed with most joyous anticipations; and they said all the rooms at the spacious hotel had already been engaged, and were rapidly being occupied, although it was only the first week in June.

Uncle Eben had gone to New York city on business, and Aunt Phœbe had received a letter from him which she was reading, when suddenly her brow became clouded, and, with an expressive "Humph," she exclaimed:

"Dear me! if Eben hain't gone and engaged to take that Rosa Van Withren for the summer! Well, I never did!"

"Well, auntie," I began, "I though you wanted some people to come here:t what difference does it make?"—but she cut me short—

"You know nothing about it, Maggie; the Van Witherns are one of those old, rich, important feeling families who hold themselves above every one else; they were at the hotel last summer, and this daughter Rosa was with them; I can see her now with her aristocratic ways! Her aristocratic ways! She is not the kind I want in my house. What will Mr. and Mrs. Herbert think, I wonder, staid, sensible people as they are? That's the class of persons I like to entertain, wealthy to be sure, but totally free from fashionable ideas and humbug airs!"

"Another thing," Aunt Phœbe continued, excitedly, "Rosa Van Withren is a very different person, Maggie, from what your mother would wish to have you thrown in with. You're a tolerably sensible girl now, but there's no knowing what a few months with a prinking New York girl would make of you. Well, all is, we must treat her politely, but you've no need to make a companion of her, and as to all the world of furbelows and earthly vanities she will bring along in her great 'Saratoga,' you must remember such things are very displeasing to the Lord; it's all of the earth, earthy, and no one with true religion in their heart will run after such things."

Now I heard Jane—Aunt Phœbe's cook say that "of all the close, fussy creatures she ever heard of, that rich, disagreeable woman from Springfield ranked first and foremost." So I might be pardoned for concluding in my own mind, how well I should like "staid, sensible Mrs. Herbert." but Jane had added, that most persons who came from Massachusetts, and particularly from Boston, were "just splendid," very kind and considerate of the "help," and "nice, sober people." But way down deep in my wicked little heart, I secretly rejoiced that this proud, handsome, stylish young lady was coming home with Uncle Eben. My reading had furnished me with some idea of what a person might be and I really trembled with excitement—unsophisticated creature that I was—at the thought of inhabiting the same house with a real live "fashionable." True, there must be sin in it, but like stolen waters, the very fact of the dangers accompanying the forming of such an acquaintance, seemed to possess a forbidden sweetness.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert were to arrive next morning, and in the evening Miss Van Withren and Uncle Eben were expected; so all was hurry and bustle for the remainder of the day. The great square, front room on the second story was to be reserved for the Herberts, Miss Van Withren was to occupy a spacious room next theirs, and my room was next to hers, the third apartment on the same floor.

"Now mind," Aunt Phœbe again cautioned me, "don't you be getting intimate with that Miss Rosa; though I guess there's no danger," she added, "for she won't probably notice you any more than if you were a post."

She wouldn't eh! Well, after all, that was perhaps the very best thing Aunt Phœbe could have said. It restored my equilibrium. I had expected to blush and tremble when she came, but if that was to be my treatment, she might ignore my presence as she pleased—I shouldn't care.

Sure enough the next morning, with what seemed to me a great deal of pomp and bustle, came Mr. and Mrs. Herbert. No great wonder she cared but little for the pride and fashion of life. She was fully 50 years of age, and weighed about 200 pounds, and it took the entire household, me included, all of two hours to wait upon her after her arrival. Not so Mr. H., he settled down at once in a comfortable arm chair and troubled no one.

And toward evening, just before tea time, came Uncle Eben and Miss Van Withren. She was the fairest creature I had ever seen. I mean the fairest and loveliest. The day had been warm, and the journey from New York long and tedious. A mass of bright, crimpy hair partly shaded her white forehead, while her great hazel eyes had a worn look in their liquid depths which went to my heart. Aunt Phœbe was pleasant and cordial enough to her, but she looked so tired out and sweet withal that, forgetting my intended indifference, I almost instinctively took her traveling satchel and offered to go with her to her room

As we entered the room together she said, heartily: "Oh, how kind you are! and I am so thankful you are here; I was afraid there might be no young people in the house."

Then I left her and immediately the tea bell rang.

In a few moments Miss Van Writhen came down, a charming picture to my eyes; she apologized for coming to dinner in her traveling dress, but explained she felt too tired to open her trunks at once. Her traveling dress, indeed! I realized on the instant how accustomed she must to be to fine clothes, for the dress in question was a striped black and white silk, all puffed and looped, and ribboned and buttoned, until to my eyes, it was a perfect marvel of the dressmaker's art.

Aunt Phœbe remarked that her family dined at noon, whereupon Mrs. Herbert, in what appeared to me very ill taste, descanted at considerable length, upon the improper and unwholesome practice New York people adopted, of eating their heartiest meal at nightfall; to all of which the young lady assented, with well bred acquiescence.

The next day was spent by our stately visitor in unpacking. She had explained that the reason of her coming to N—without her parents, was because they were unable to leave the city for two months longer, and Uncle Eben offering his escort, it was thought best to send her this early, where she could breathe good country air. Later in the season her parents hoped to join her.

Well, it was not in the nature of things for two young ladies of about the same age to occupy adjoining rooms without becoming somewhat familiar. Yet I had stood aloof, really admiring this beautiful girl, but determined she should never have cause to feel contempt for me for forcing myself upon her notice in any way. But she was a mighty fascination. It frequently happened she would ask me some question which would result in my staying into her room while she was dressing for the afternoon. And what a pleasure and attraction it was to watch the completion of her toilet. With shapely white fingers she would deftly plant a jaunty bow, or sweet tuft of flowers, in the midst of a mass of crimps over her smooth brow, and it would look as if there, both bow and crimps, without being placed by hands, so perfectly graceful and unstudied would be the entire arrangement. Her elegantly laundered muslins, or crisp silks, fitted her faultless figure to a charm, and even the ribbon or flower was as dainty nestled among the laces at her throat as though placed by fairy fingers. She became to me a beautiful study by her rich attire, and finished manners, although "probably brought up in a ball room," as Mrs. Herbert had rather spitefully remarked. I used to pray God to convert and save the lovely girl, for reared as I had been, I feared that there must be much of sinfulness and danger lurking beneath so much of tasteful display.

A few afternoons after her arrival, Mr. Spencer, the talented young minister of N——, had called, and while I sat confusedly wishing I knew just what to say, Rosa swept noiselessly into the room. Oh, the ease and grace with which she received and conversed with him! I can see now the perfect attitude she assumed, all unconscious apparently of the faultless adjustment, as seating herself sideways on the sofa, so as to face him as he sat in his arm chair, her long trail laid in ample folds along the floor.

To my surprise some question which Mr. Spencer asked revealed the fact that Rosa taught a large class of boys in the Howard mission Sunday school.

"Why!" I said afterward, "do you teach in the Sunday school?"

"Certainly," she replied; "I couldn't well get along without my poor dear boys; ma sometimes worries about me going so often to their wretched homes, but it is one of my chief pleasures to try to comfort them now and then!"

Aha! here was a new phase in this dressy beauty's character. That was more than I had ever done in my life. I had prayed for the poor, but most people in our village were comfortably off, so I knew little about wretched homes of poverty, but the New York poor of others!"

It is true Rosa used frequently to ride with fashionable acquaintances at the hotel and spent more or less time in gay company, but sweeter or more agreeable manners I had never seen, although remarks and innuendoes continually thrown out by Aunt Phœbe and Mrs. Herbert, made me always somewhat reserved in her presence, but often she would seem lonely, and on one occasion standing before me exquisitely gotten up as usual—she said lovingly:

"You are so bright and pretty, Maggie dear; but I think—I imagine—you don't just fancy me. I could love you dearly too."

I longed to throw my arms around her white neck; and bury my lips in her dimpled cheek; but I thought of the allusions so constantly made as warnings, concerning her sinful worldliness, and sat still. Silly dolt that I was.

One evening just as we had finished supper, on of the neighbor's boys burst excitedly into the dining room, with the unpleasant intelligence that one of the Glen boys "had been run over" and Dr. Gray doubted if he could live through the night.

The "Glen boys" belonged to a very poor but respectable family, who lived about a mile from Aunt Phœbe's, and although every one expressed surprise and curiosity, no one seemed to take very deeply to heart the fact that a "mother's boy" was suffering great bodily pain and in danger of speedy death.

A few moments later, to my surprise, I met Rosa in the hall, plainly dressed in a short cambric—of a remarkably pretty pattern—and with her gypsy and gloves, I saw she was equipped for a walk.

"Why, it is almost dark," I said, "are you going out alone?"

"I am going to poor Mrs. Glen's," she replied simply, "she must need help, or at least sympathy, this long, painful night."

"Oh let me go too! do," I pleaded for she hesitated to reply.

"Certainly, if your aunt is willing; but I may stay until morning."

Aunt Phœbe's face would indeed have been "a picture for a painter," when I told her where I wished to go, and with whom.

"Law, yes," when her surprise enabled her to find utterance, "and for mercy's sake notice what she does for all things!"—But I waited to hear no more, and another moment we were off.

But the lesson I learned that night was how a fair, jeweled hand could soothe a bruised and fevered brow; how low, cultured tones could breathe consolation into the ear of a lowly but stricken mother; how an ample purse, in generous hands could provide for some of the necessities of the suffering poor. Dear, blessed girl! Child of fashion she might be, but what harm after all, could the fine vesture prove, with such a true heart beating beneath!

And if you can believe it! When I told from a full heart, the next day, some of the events of the previous night to Aunt Phœbe and Mrs. Herbert, auntie only said, "Humph!" and Mrs. Herbert declared it only done for effect.

So great is "the rarity of Christian charity under the sun."

One morning, Mr. Herbert, usually an acquiescent gentleman, had announced his intention of going gunning, expecting to be absent all day. His wife had objected, but he had persisted, and when these usually acquiescent gentlemen undertake to persist in any thing, if you never knew it before, reader mine, let me inform you, they generally persist in persisting. So Mr. Herbert went gunning, and Mrs. Herbert went at once into a very unsatisfactory state of mind.

It had been a charming day and toward evening a gentleman had called and invited Rosa, and to my great delight, also invited me, to a hop on the green at the side of the hotel. Rosa had accepted the invitation, but as to poor me, oh dear! Aunt Phœbe would never consent in the world. I felt sure she wouldn't. But to my surprise and joy, my worldly wise auntie consented; with some show of reluctance it is true, and I believe she was a truly religious woman, but Rosa paid good board, and had by no means proved the objectionable person as to her manners that Aunt Phœbe had anticipated she would, besides, later in the season her parents were expected as boarders, so she, quieting her conscience with the observation that "if it was to be in the house she wouldn't consent for anything," she allowed me to go. I suppose the inference was, that to dance on God's carpet was not a quarter part the sin it would be were it one made by wicked man. She need of felt no fear on my account, however, for as a Christian I never danced, although not disposed at all to condemn others who might differ from me in the matter.

At the table, Mrs. Herbert, who had been rather testy all day, turned suddenly toward Rosa and observed, tartly:

"So you are going to dance, to-night? I understood you were a church member, and my church manual forbids such excesses on the part of professing Christians."

Now Rosa had as much spirit as it is proper for any young lady to possess; she made no reply. I only noticed that her neck curved a little more to the right, and the naturally lofty pose of her stately head became a trifle more apparent. It was this same curve and pose of neck and head, I think, which made Aunt Phœbe so pronounced as to "her aristocratic ways."

But God has so ordained that some members of his exquisitely molded lily family so carry and sway their graceful blossoms on their slender stalks, one might imagine they fancied themselves the queen of all flowers. But there is no pride in the heart of a lily; it curves and waves and displays its matchless charms, just as God made it to.

But there was to be no dance for either of us that night. As Mrs. Herbert was sweeping sullenly from the dining room she paused at a window in passing, and the next instant with more alarm than elegance:

"Oh, my goodness gracious! what does this mean I wonder?"

All hurried to the window, and at first could only discern a motley crowd approaching the house, but a moment more and it became apparent that some one was being borne along on some kind of a pallet. An instant later it was only too plain, Poor Mr. Herbert, like many another luckless sportsman, had himself proved the game of his intended pleasure.

I need not describe the excitement and bustle which followed. For one thing we were all thankful enough. The pleasant, easy going man was still alive. The doctor entered the house at the same time Mr. Herbert was brought in disfigured, soiled and bleeding. He sharply ordered "bandages, plenty of them; quick, too!" Mrs. Herbert was of no assistance whatever, she could only wring her hands in real anguish, and implore every one to save him, her "dear, good, kind husband, oh save him!"

Aunt Phœbe ran for old linen, and quick as a flash I saw Rosa tear her delicate cambric handkerchief in two, and handed it to the doctor, who tightly bound it about the bleeding wrist. All that night, Aunt Phœbe, Rosa and I watched and bathed, and carefully tended the poor unconscious sufferer.

The next day, however, other boarders arrived, and Aunt Phœbe could not spend many moments in the sick room. It was impossible to find a trustworthy nurse in the town, and for a whole long stifling hot week, Rosa and I shared the vigils of the wonderfully softened woman, who watched by the bedside of her dearly loved husband.

One day I witnessed a scene which sent me rushing to my room, to give way to irrepressible sobs. The doctor had pronounced Mr. Herbert out of danger, adding to his wife, "and you can greatly thank your young friends here, who have rendered you such wonderful good assistance in this time of need, particularly that young princess, who has stood by you day and night. She needs rest now. Her eyes are heavy with something besides their own splendor." Happening to go to Rosa's room on some trifling errand, I saw Mrs. Herbert standing before her, and all at once she threw her arms around Rosa's neck exclaiming:

"Oh, you lovely Christian! I've spurned you because I thought you dressed too much; I've ridiculed the idea of your professing religion, because being young and beautiful you have adhered with natural pleasure to customs of the fashionable society in which you have been reared. But God Almighty has shown me that it is by their fruits his children are to be known, and you are one of the Lord's own. Oh, forgive me, dear child."

But I could wait to hear no more, I only rushed away as I have described; but all barriers were swept away that summer night. I had my own little confession to make, not only to Rosa, but to my own heart; and the lesson I learned from contact with this beautiful girl was a most wholesome one. I know now, it does not follow that the rich and fashionable are necessarily proud or ungodly. Neither are they the heartless creatures we are too prone to imagine them.

I was surprised, I must own, when, at the end of the season, our "talented young minister" begged of Rosa's parents the privilege of offering his love to their beautiful daughter. She turned from the proffered gold which wealthier suitors ardently urged upon her acceptance, and took the pure love of good Mr. Spencer.

She has been one of us for years now; for I spent my summers still with Aunt Phœbe, I and mine. It is true she is always faultlessly attired; it is her nature to be, and I believe it is one reason why she is so invariably fresh and attractive to all admiring eyes. Her lovely face is greatly beloved by "her people." And what wonder! No home so lowly but her daintily shod feet can enter most willingly. No one sunk so low in vice or crime, but she can stretch out her soft, white hand to render good assistance in helping to lift them up. No child so poor or small, but she could bend her queenly head to bestow the expected caress. And even Aunt Phœbe has long since ceased to mention, even if still conscious of her aristocratic ways.

Grant's Love for Children.

Sturdy soldier as he is, General Grant has a tender corner in his heart for the young, and especially for his own relatives, and is very thoughtful about their needs. Recently, going into the United States national bank in New York, he asked its vice president to get for him twenty English sovereigns. The next day he came back, and as the twenty English gold pieces were counted out to him, drew out of a vest pocket $100 in United States treasury notes, which he had rolled up in farmer style, and laid them over, while out of another pocket, carefully wrapped in paper, he took a handsome new Russia leather pocketbook, in which he deposited the gold, saying as he did so: "I have a little niece who is going to Europe to-morrow. She never had $100 of her own before, so I am going to delight her heart with this." This niece is the daughter of his sister, Mrs. Cramer.—Washington Star Long Branch Letter.

TORNADOES.

Scientifically Accounted for, and Some Remote Causes that Produce Painful Results Explained.

The following synopsis of a lecture delivered by Dr. Horace B. Hamilton before the New York society for the promotion of science, contains so much that is timely and important that it can be read with both interest and profit:

There is probably no subject of modern times that has caused and is causing greater attention than the origin of tornadoes. Scientists have studied it for the benefit of humanity; men have investigated it for the welfare of their families. It has been a vexed subject long considered, and through all this investigation the cyclone has swept across the land carrying destruction to scientists as well as to the innocent dwellers in its track. One thing, however, is certain; the cause of the cyclone must be sought far away from the whirling body of wind itself. Its results are powerful; its cause must also be powerful. Let us therefore consider a few facts. First, the appearance of a cyclone is invariably preceded by dark spots upon the face of the sun. These spots indicating a disturbed condition of the solar regions, necessarily affect the atmosphere of our earth. An unusual generation of heat in one part of the atmosphere is certain to cause a partial vacuum in another portion. Air must rush in to fill this vacuum. Hence the disturbances—hence the cyclone. This theory finds additional confirmation in the fact that tornadoes come during the day and not at night. The dark spots upon the surface of the sun, whatever they may be, seem to cause great commotion in the atmosphere of the world, and it is almost certain that the extremely wet weather of the present season can be accounted for on precisely this basis. Is it reasonable to suppose that the marvelous effect of the sun upon vegetation and life in general shall be less than upon the atmosphere itself through which its rays come? The cause is remote, but the effect is here.

After describing some of the terrible effects of the cyclone, the speaker went on to say:—

This rule finds its application in nearly every department of life. An operator is in San Francisco—the click of the instrument manipulated by his fingers, in New York. The president makes a slight stroke of the pen in his study at the White House, and the whole nation is aroused by the act. An uneasiness and disgust with everything in life, commonly called home-sickness, is felt by many people, when the cause is to be found in the distant home thousands of miles away. An uncertain pain may be felt in the head. It is repeated in other parts of the body. The appetite departs and all energy is gone. Is the cause necessarily to be found in the head? The next day the feeling increases. There are added symptoms. They continue and become more aggravated. The slight pains in the head increase to agonies. The nausea becomes chronic. The heart grows irregular, and the breathing uncertain. All these effects have a definite cause; and, after years of deep experience upon this subject, I do not hesitate to say that this cause is to be found in some derangement of the kidneys or liver far away from that portion of the body in which these effects appear. But one may say, I have no pain whatever in my kidneys or liver. Very true. Neither have we any evidence that there is a tornado on the surface of the sun; but it is none the less certain that the tornado is here, and it is none the less certain that these great organs of the body are the cause of the trouble although there may be no pain in their vicinity.

I know whereof I speak, for I have passed through this very experience myself. Nearly ten years ago, I was the picture of health, weighing more than 200 pounds, and as strong and healthy as any man I ever knew. When I felt the symptoms I have above described, they caused me annoyance, not only by reason of their aggravating nature, but because I had never felt any pain before. Other doctors told me I was troubled with malaria, and I treated myself accordingly. I did not believe, however, that malaria could show such aggravated symptoms. It never occurred to me that analysis would help solve the trouble, as I did not presume my difficulty was located in that portion of the body. But I continued to grow worse. I had a faint sensation at the pit of my stomach nearly every day. I felt a great desire to eat, and yet I loathed food. I was constantly tired and still I could not sleep. My brain was unusually active, but I could not think connectedly. My existence was a living misery. I continued in this condition for nearly a year; never free from pain, never for a moment happy. Such an existence is far worse than death, for which I confess I earnestly longed.

It was while suffering thus that a friend advised me to make a final attempt to recover my health. I sneered inwardly at his suggestion, but I was too weak to make any resistance. He furnished me with a remedy, simple yet palatable and within two days I observed a slight change for the better. This awakened my courage, I felt that I would not die at that time. I continued the use of the remedy, taking it in accordance with directions, until I became not only restored to my former health and strength, but of greater vigor than I have before known. This condition has continued up to the present time, and I believe I should have died as miserably as thousands of other men have died and are dying every day had it not been for the simple yet wonderful power of Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy I employed.

The lecturer then described his means of restoration more in detail, and concluded as follows:

My complete recovery has caused me to investigate the subject more carefully, and I believe I have discovered the key to most ill health of our modern civilization. I am fully confident that four-fifths of the diseases which afflict humanity might be avoided were the kidneys and liver kept in perfect condition. Were it possible to control the action of the sun, cyclones could undoubtedly be averted. That, however, is one of the things that cannot be. But I rejoice to say that it is possible to control the kidneys and liver; to render their action wholly normal, and their effect upon the system that of purifiers rather than poisoners. That this end has been accomplished largely by means of the remedy I have named I do not have a doubt, and I feel it my duty to make this open declaration for the enlightenment of the profession and for the benefit of suffering humanity in all parts of the world.

A Scotch Chairman's Speech at an Agricultural Show.

"Now, gentlemen, will ye a' fill your glasses, for I'm aboot to bring forward 'The Queen.' (Applause.) Our queen gentlemen, is really a wonderful woman, if I may say it; she's one o' guid auld sort, nae whigmaleeries or falderals aboot her, but a douce daecent body. She's respectable beyond a doubt. She has brought up a grand family o' weel faured lads and lassies; her auldest son being a credit to any mother, and they are a' weel married. One daughter is nae less than married to the Duke o' Argyll's son and heir. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, y'll mny be no' believe it, but I once saw the queen. (Sensational) I did. It was when I took my auld brown cow tae Perth show, I remember her well; such color; such hair—(Interruption and cries of "Is it the cow or the queen ye are proposing?") The queen, gentlemen; I beg your pardon, but I was talking aboot the cow. However, as to the queen, somebody pointed her out tae me at Perth station, and there she was, smart, and tidy-like, and says I to mysel' 'Gin my auld woman at hame slips away ye neen na' remain a widow another hour longer.' (Cheers.) Now, gentlemen, the whisky's guid, the night is long, the weather is wet, and the roads are soft, and will harm naebody that comes to grief. So off wi' yer drinks tae the bottom. 'The Queen.'" (Cheers.)

Humanity's great hope for the future is alone to be realized in improved conditions of matrimony. What a profound obligation does this fact involve. Those who realize the responsibility can hardly do better than take advice from Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham whose wonderful remedies for the cure of all diseases peculiar to women are so justly celebrated. Apropos of yachts, a good story is going the rounds in relation to one of the best-known American yachtsmen. He was down East at a small country town one day last week and reported his intended movements to his wife, as usual, in the early morning. On this occasion the telegram said: "Going for a short trip along the coast. Have invited all the oldest and ugliest hens in the town." This dispatch was handed to a female telegraph operator, who immediately rushed around informing the guests of the manner in which they were alluded to. The gallant owner of the yacht could not account for the slim attendance till a lady friend of his wife wrote to her about it.

GENERAL P. H. SHERIDAN.

His Home Life and Social Relations —Anecdotes

Chicago News.

The average biographer's weakness is the boyhood of his hero in detail. Not so with the writers of the life of General Sheridan. This failure has not annoyed the man who lives at 2007 Michigan avenue, in this city. The peace which surrounds the private life of the occupant seems to be too perfect to be broken by his contemplated removal. The house where he lives is simple in its construction, plain in its exterior. The furnishings are plain.

One would know as he wanders about that its master had been a soldier at some time. The pictures on the walls, the statuary, the books in the library, indicate the character [illegible] the man. There is one room that [illegible] filled with helmets, bonnets, swords, spears, shell, and the various implements of war by civilized and savage nations. He has gathered a store-house of these. And when he saunters about them, and when he looks at his pictures or his books, twins toddle after him, get tangled in his feet, and tug at the tails of his coat until he picks them up, one in each arm, and goes rollicking about the lawn with them, if it is as bright in the sky as it is under his own roof.

Two others, a boy and a girl, the first Phil. Sheridan, Jr. come in for recognition, and get it. It doesn't take any fathoming to discern that the wife and mother of this home is just the happiest Chicago. This is all the more pleasant to think about when one is reminded that she is not more than half way up to him in years.

They all sit down to the table together, when nobody is there to intrude. Those twins get served first. They get helped as often as they wish—just as long as the platter holds out. They know there is a ride for them, and they know that no circus can ever come to town and get away without their presence, guarded by the same man who attracted the eye of Grant at Missionary Ridge. They have their little parties and their little entertainments. They shout, and roll about, and play, and sometimes go to the matinees. The General plays euchre with his guests—the only game he does play—and these cherubs never disturb him, though they may crawl between his legs and steal his cards.

"I don't know what he wants with a carriage, for himself," said one of his friends; "he never gets into it when he can help it. If the day is fine, he likes to walk down town; and if it isn't, he had rather come in a horse-car." By the way, it is a little curious that a man who is as fond of horse-flesh as he, and who is so superb when mounted, should never be found in the saddle any more. When his last war-horse, "Winchester," died a few years ago, his love for the possession of that sort of flesh went with him.

One who knows him well vouches for the truth of the story that the first time Phil. Sheridan was ever on a horse was when Bill Seymour, a boy in Perry county, O., put him on a fiery animal, unsaddled, unbridled, and told him to hold on with his knees. And he did, until the horse had galloped about two miles across the open country, when the beast came to a halt. Phil. was still on his back, holding on with his knees. It became the told of the country. Gossip was scarce in those days.

He was errand boy, and then the driver of a water cart in Zanesville. His elder brother had some influence with the congressman of the district, and in 1848 had Phil. appointed as a cadet to the United States military academy. No need to follow him from the graduating class to the close of the war. In school he was a student. The honor of discovering his merits as a soldier lies between General Grant and the late Edwin M. Stanton. The two latter and President Lincoln were talking one evening about the cavalry being without a head or leader. Buford was dead.

"How would Sheridan do?" asked the secretary of war.

"That's the very man," answered General Grant.

"Do you know him?" asked President Lincoln.

"I do," replied General Grant. "I watched him at Missionary Ridge."

"Send for him," responded the president.

Sheridan is one of the best dressed men on the streets of Chicago. His tailor lives here and says he has the best figure of any customer he has. His fits are of the glove pattern, and as he walks down the street with a cigar, a switch cane in his hand, a white hat and his apparel without a wrinkle, he is as graceful a figure as appears in the "passing show." He is most respectful in his pew at St. Mary's, where he can be found nearly evey Sunday. His nearest approach to aristocratic bearing is his crest.

He is to leave Chicago in September for Washington, to succeed Gen. Sherman. This reminds one that he was one of the first captains in Sherman's regiment. His going will rob Chicago of one of its most cherished celebrities. Aside from the pride which citizens take in him as the soldier, those who knew him in his social relations will have genuine reasons for regret. The preparations for an adieu to him are now being arranged.

Gen. Sheridan was born in 1831, and his wife is the daughter of Gen. Rucker, of the regular army. He wooed and won her here. He is a Chicago man. The most intimate friend he has said a few days ago: "I know whereof I speak when I say to you that in all his success Gen. Sheridan never had a political aspiration of any sort in his life."

Aside from his military life there are few anecdotes of General Sheridan.

Once, after a certain battle in the south, during one of the seasons of inactivity which always followed an advance in the earlier years of the war, General Sheridan went on a visit to his native heath. The fact that he was coming stirred up those along the way whose enthusiasm had been latent while their hero had been in danger. They prepared him a royal reception. People from the fields and towns remote from the railway lines came out in wagons, stages and carts. At the point where the little soldier was to be received the multitudes assembled.

One of the trains came in and a shout went up. The crowd seized a richly uniformed soldier, and the hurrahs for Sheridan circled to the sun. The bands played and the anvil artillery belched. The soldier was carried to a coach, and the committee was crushed by the populace. As the conveyance was about to move some newspaper reporter chanced to discover that the guest was another man—Col. Mike Sheridan—the brother of the general. He had submitted to the inundation of welcome, and, when the mistake was discovered, appeared as much contented as the crowd appeared sold.

The next train brought in the right man. The excitement was not quite so intense, having spent its force on Colonel Mike. The way was open to the old stage-coach which waited. The committee bowed at the door. The warrior, arriving at the step, motioned the committee to precede him. The members went in, and were seated. Then the general shut the door, lighted a cigar, and said: "Gentlemen, with your permission I will ride with the driver." The master of the reins glowed like a heated furnace. He drove away in a manner that was stately. The general in placing his cigar put the lighted end in his mouth. He winced and shook his head. The Jehu managed to get his head turned from the wheeler and said: "From the fuss that they was makin' about ye, I never thought yees was afraid of a little foire like that."

A MILLION DOLLAR CHICKEN

How the Biggest Mountain Hotel in the World Came to be Built.

Letter From the Catskill (N. Y.) Mountains

Philadelphia lawyers are supposed to beat the world in their line, and one of them, the famous patent lawyer, George Harding, who has made more money than he knows what to do with in the big cases he has had in hand since he won for Morse the great telegraphic suit with Bayne, is now indulging his fancy for building the largest, handsomest and most complete mountain hotel in all creation. This is how he came to set about it. For ten years he had been summering at Beach's Catskill Mountain House (now known as the old Mountain House) where he got good air and such table fare as suited the convenience of his independent and opinionated host who seemed to think he had the monopoly of the Catskill mountain business. One day Harding wanted some chicken broth for a sick child, but it was not "chicken day" at the Mountain House, and none could be got there, so Harding sent down to the valley, fifteen miles, and got a chicken and took it to the kitchen to be cooked. The landlord objected to the trouble of this special cooking, and told Harding crushingly that if he wasn't satisfied with the way the hotel was run he had better build a hotel of his own. "By Jove," said Harding, "I never thought of that! I believe I will," and he did. He quietly set about the purchase of all the adjacent mountain land to the extent of some 25,000 acres, and then, in September, 1880, started a force of about 1,200 men and 400 teams building roads up the nearly perpendicular mountain side and erecting a huge hotel on the crest of the mountain, 3,000 feet above the sea and 500 feet higher than the chickenless Old Mountain House.

The difficulties in the way of building these zig-zag roads up the face of the mountain where the engineers said no roads could be built, and afterwards dragging the material for the hotel up them and erecting a house of this size in the depth of a bitter, stormy winter, were immense, but energy and money overcame them, and on June 28, 1881. the hotel was opened for use. From its commanding position and colossal size, it is a conspicuous feature of the whole Catskill region, either by day, when it appears like a white cloud resting on the mountain top, or at night, when electric lights throw it out in relief against the sky like an aerial palace. It is five stories in height, with stately wings and piazzas, and has a frontage of 612 feet. The dining room has a seating capacity for 1,200 guests, and the kitchen can cook for 2,000 people without inconvenience. The hotel will accomodate 1,000 people readily, and it is proposed to build a number of cottages on the commanding sites in the neighborhood for the use of other guests. The house is finished in hard woods, walnut and ash; the furniture and hangings are of Eastlake designs; and. in fact, the whole establishment shows the most lavish expenditure of money in the way of construction and furnishing.

The hotel is in fact a hobby of Mr. Harding's who has chosen to expend his money in developing the Catskill region and opening its attractions to convenient access, just as other millionaires expend theirs in yachts and fast horses. He has already spent about $750,000 in the purchase and improvement of the land, the erection of the hotel, &c.; and the cost of other improvements contemplated will swell the outlay to a round million. Can the hotel be made to pay interest on this enormous investment? Perhaps the owner does not expect an immediate return, but is looking to the future when he shall have carried out all his plans, including that of bringing visitors by rail to the very door of his hotel, which will place the crown of the Catskills within two hours time of New York City, and correspondingly easy of access to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

The King of Corea.

The King of Corea is described as about thirty years of age, small and slight of stature, with a mild, pleasant face. He wears a small black moustache and thin beard. On his head he wore, during the meeting with the United States officers about the treaty, a network cap with wings, but little different in shape from the court cap of the ministers. His dress was of silk, in color a brilliant scarlet, having on each shoulder and on the breast hideous golden dragons in heavy gold embroidery. The dress was secured at the waist by a belt of crimson and gold, from which it fell in heavy folds to his feet. The sleeves of his dress were very wide, and so long that they covered his hands. The king is seldom seen by any one except the high officials and the attendants about the palace. There are two temples in the city to which he goes occasionally to offer sacrifice, but he goes in such strict seclusion that very few of his subjects have ever seen him. The presentation to him of the American Legation was noteworthy as being the first occasion of the kind that has ever taken place, and was the first time that he had ever seen foreign dress.

Sherman's Call for 200,000 Men.

In the fall of 1861 Secretary Cameron and Senator Zach Chandler came to this city to consult with Gov. Morton, after having visited Louisville and consulted Gen. Sherman, who was stationed there. The informant of the News was one of the party among whom the consultation here was had and he says that Mr. Cameron derided the idea of such a force as the general wanted and was seconded by the senator. Both of them very freely declared that the general's sense of his responsibility had unsettled his intellect and that he was unfit for so important a position. Gov. Morton, with a far keener insight, said very little. He had expressed to the News' informant a few days before, on his return from a visit to Gen. Sherman, the opinion that the latter was unduly discouraged and probably overestimated the danger and difficulty. "He wanted 200,000 men," said the governor, and he doubted "if it wouldn't take a year, even with that force, to drive the rebels below the Tennessee line." It took all of both before the work was done. But the governor was somewhat impressed with the notion that the general's mind was unsettled by the multitude of his task and the hopeless inadequacy of his forces. "He walks his room incessantly," said the governor, "like a wild beast in a cage, and can talk of nothing but the impossibility of doing anything with the means at his command." As far as this testimony goes it is authentic.—[Indianapolis News.

FIELD AND FARM.

Household Recipes.

LAMB AND PEAS.—Cut the lamb in small pieces, put them in a sauce-pan with a large lump of butter, and cook until both sides are brown; then pour over hot water enough to cover the meat; let this cook slowly for an hour, then remove the meat from the stew-pan; make a rich gravy, adding to the water in the pan an onion sliced thin, plenty of pepper and salt, any herb you like, or in place of the onion, and before putting in the flour to thicken the gravy, put in a quart of green peas, and cook them for from fifteen to twenty minutes; skim them out, thicken the gravy, and serve meat and peas and gravy all in one deep platter.

RASPBERRY JAM.—Take a pint of currant juice and a pound and a quarter of loaf sugar to each quart of raspberries. Dissolve the sugar in the currant juice, using a deep bowl, and put the raspberries into the syrup at once in your preserving kettle. Take off the scum that rises, and boil twenty minutes, mashing up the berries. The preserve tumbler with rounded ends are best for jam, as you can turn it out entire as from a mold.

POTATO SALAD.—Instead of using olive oil for this salad, cut up breakfast bacon into small square dice, put them into a pan and brown them on the fire; this done, add at once a gill or so of vinegar to the pan, make hot. Have your cold boiled potatoes, already sliced and seasoned with pepper, a small onion and some parsley mixed. They will probably need no salt, as the bacon gravy will be sufficient. Pour gravy as prepared above, all over the potatoes and mix well together. This bacon mixture will be found a most excellent and savory dressing for lettuce salad also.

GOLD CAKE.—One cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, two cups of flour, yolks of six eggs, grated rind and juice of a lemon or orange, half a teaspoonful of soda, mixed with the flour and sifted twice. Cream and butter, add the sugar, then the beaten yolks and the flour, beating hard for several minutes. Last add the lemon or orange juice and bake, frosting if liked.

RED RASPBERRY PUDDING.—To two ounces of butter allow three ounces each of sugar and flour: beat two eggs very light and mix with sugar; then add the flour and butter, which you have warmed so that it will mix readily; a little salt and grated nutmeg may then be stirred in. Butter some coffee cups, and in the bottom of each one put a tablespoonful—a large one—of raspberry jam, or two tablespoonfuls of fresh berries; then pour the pudding mixture over them. Leave a space at the top so that the pudding may rise a little. Bake for half an hour, and serve with cream and sugar, or with wine sauce.

Fortunes in Stock.

But few persons estimate the rapid increase of a herd of cattle, and consequently are at a loss to know why such fine fortunes are made on the farm or ranch by cattle breeding and feeding. A man starts out with one hundred good cows, with ample range for them. Let us see what he may reasonably expect in return for his capital and care in ten years. The cows say cost $50 per head, or 5,000. If the cows and their female progeny are kept for breeding, it is reasonable to estimate forty per cent increase in female calves yearly, as well as the same increase in male calves. The increase in the female line will be as follows:

	Heifers.
100 cows in first year drop	40
100 cows in second year drop	40
140 cows in third year drop	56
180 cows in fourth year drop	72
236 cows in fifth year drop	94
308 cows in sixth year drop	123
402 cows in seventh year drop	161
525 cows in eighth year drop	210
686 cows in ninth year drop	274
896 cows in tenth year drop	358
Total ten years	1,428

There will be an equal number of male calves, which will come into market at three years of age as follows:

Fat steers at end of third year	40
Fat steers at end of fourth year	40
Fat steers at end of fifth year	56
Fat steers at end of sixth year	72
Fat steers at end of seventh year	94
Fat steers at end of eighth year	123
Fat steers at end of ninth year	161
Fat steers at end of tenth year	210
Total for seven years	706

These at $60 per head will amount to $47,760, which had been received during the last seven years of the ten, to refund capital and pay expenses. At the end of ten years there will be on hand 1,428 cows and heifers, and 274 two-year old steers and 358 one-year-old. It will be observed in all these calculations of either heifers or steers we have allowed for 20 per cent. per year for failure of calves and for deaths and accidents afterwards. The steers which have been marketed pay the first investment of $5,000, and leave $4,200 per year for expenses. The stock on hand at the end of ten years is worth $80,000. This is how money is made on large stock farms or on ranches on the plains.

Profitable Farming for a Poor Man.

The Rural New Yorker is publishing a series of articles by farmers under the above title. Here is the substance of one of them: The principles that govern and secure profitable farming for a poor man are identical, or nearly so, with the principles that govern profitable farming for any other man. And, as I am convinced that nine men fail for lack of proper general management, where one man fails for poor farming proper, I shall commence by offering some hints on general business management. When a farmer has no capital but his head and hands it is necessary that he should have something in his head. The same is true of those engaged in any other calling. The first thing to commence then and the last thing to leave off is professional self-improvement. This is the key to the whole situation—the one thing needful for complete ultimate success. And is it not enough to know the fact; we must seek the reason for its existence. Knowing that we work like intelligent beings using means to an end. Just as a good lawyer always seeks for the reason of his point of law, so a good farmer should know the reason he has a rotation of crops, and in fact the reason he does each thing as he does.

Somebody says the way to get rich is to spend less than we make; and doubtless this will succeed if we live long enough. Out of the first things for a poor man to attend to is to spend as little as he possibly can, in the early part of his career. If he ever intends to economize, he should do it at the commencement. In after years it will be a habit. Let him remember that one dollar represents to him more wealth, comparatively, now, than five, ten, or even twenty dollars with a few years hence. Let him run his own business in his own way regardless of adverse criticism. The old saw has it that "he laughs best who laughs last." Be economical, not niggardly. Live as well as you can afford, no better. Beware of store bills. They are easily contracted but hard to abate. Better often borrow money at 10 per cent. and buy close for cash than run a store bill. Merchants delights most to trust him who asks no no trust. When compelled to go into debt be prompt to pay and thereby build up a credit, for no man needs a credit more than a poor man. Cultivate the acquaintance of successful men and successful farmers; you will thereby become acquainted with their methods to your own advantage. Don't speculate till you have money to lose. Concentrate everything on your business till you get it in good running order and of the desirable dimensions. It is then time enough to sport with the proceeds. If you go in debt let it be for something that will return you at least double the interest you pay, and that is legitimately connected with your business. And still again, stick to a point. Persevere in the line you have mapped out untill you are sure you are wrong. If difficulties arise (as they certainly will) overcome them. If you meet with an obstacle in your path, don't attempt to go around it lest you encounter other and greater difficulties, but move it aside and go on. The man who centrates will win. Don't be too fast to try new things on anything of a large scale: wait awhile till they become established and you will save many a dollar.

Coffee and Tea Drinking.

In the World of Science a physician advises people not to take coffee or tea after dinner or at breakfast. Cocoa is recomended for breakfast for those who can digest it, but hot water is better. Those who dine late, and need no dilulent drink an hour or two afterward, but cannot drink tea on account of being kept awake by it, are also counseled to use hot water. "I find," he says, "that dining solidly at 7 1-2, and often needing to work from 9 to 11, a tumbler of hot water brought into my laboratory is the best drink, and, after a few evenings, will be as much relished as tea. The hot water assists to complete the digestion of residual food, acts upon the kidneys and will be found to wake one up without injuring the stomach or keeping the brain awake after bed time. In cold weather warm water is the best drink at dinner time, and in hot weather is wholesomer and more cooling than iced water."

Concerning Housekeepers.

There is an old saying that poets are born, not made, and we believe the same is true of housekeepers. Some women fit into the position perfectly. They assume the directorship of the household so quietly, and rule it so easily that we quite forget the labor in the results, or perhaps imagine there is no labor at all. We all look on admiringly when we get a glimpse of such a household, or of such a presiding genius, and wonder why we cannot do as well. For we are not all born housekeepers, and to some of us the post brings care, vexation, and weariness of soul and body. But let us console ourselves if we fail, or correct our pride if we succeed, by remembering that to be a perfect housekeeper demands nearly all the known virtues and qualities. One must be wise, dignified, prudent, firm, methodical, skillful, cheerful and gentle; possessing also tact, courage in emergencies, inventive faculty and teachableness!

There! if that is not enough to make a perfect woman, what more would you have. Yet there are many women among us who are scarcely known outside their family circle, who have never written a line or printed a picture, who have never been directors of a hospital or managers of charity, but who are entitled to claim all the just mentioned attributes for their own. And they go on quietly from day to day, never knowing their worth, content with scant praise or none at all, well satisfied if only they can harmonize their cares and duties, and thus avoid friction! These are domestic heroines, whose praises should be sung appropriately. Their less gifted sisters should crown them with garlands, while they sit at their feet and strive to learn something of their ways. And their husbands and children should count themselves especially blessed that the guiding spirits of their homes are so near perfection.—Christian Intelligence.

A Blank in Life.

A military officer, having been wounded in the head while giving an order, was rendered unconscious and remained so—though otherwise well—for many years. At length the depression in his skull was removed by an operation, trepanning, consciousness was immediately restored, and he at once completed the order he was giving when he was wounded on the battlefield.

The long interval between the moment when he was first wounded and the restoring of the bone of his skull to its original position, was a total blank, and the two far-separated periods came together as if no moment had intervened.

Similar cases are, no doubt, more or less familiar to our readers. The following case is somewhat different from the above, and is more recent, having occurred in the practice of Dr. McCormack, president of the Kentucky Medical society,

The person, when fifteen years old, was accidentally struck on the head by a hammer and rendered unconscious for several hours. He gradually recovered his senses, but a marked depression of the skull remained. At nineteen he moved from the town where he had been living, married, purchased a farm and settled on it. There was no noticeable mental peculiarity shown by him.

Some years later he complained of pain where the wound had been, became morose, and later presented all the symptoms of acute mania. He ate but little, and rapidly lost strength and flesh.

The depressed portion of his skull was at this time removed by trepanning. At once the mental derangement was relieved, and in a few weeks he was in perfect health. But the period between the accident and his cure, though it had been one of ordinary activity, comprising even marriage, purchase of farm, etc., had wholly dropped out of his mind.

He did know even his own wife, nor that he had one. His neighbors were all strangers to him. He had to learn anew the roads in the region. It required the deeds and a full explanation to convince him that he owned his farm. And yet everything prior to the accident was fresh and distinct in his memory.

The eastern part of Washington territory is very rough and not desirable for anything but herding cattle. The western portion has a mild climate and is a good grass, grain, and fruit country. It is well timbered.

BONAPARTE'S COURT.

Memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantes.

From the London Times

The memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantes are likely to retain a lasting popularity, because the authoress really knew no more of Napoleon I. than any one of the great number of persons who have written about him. Although she had a shrewd perception of the Emporor's character and was by no means blind to his faults, her womanly enthusiasm for his genius inclined her often to praise the hero overmuch and to assail his enemies with unreasonable animus. But this only makes her book more lively; and historians will continue to go to it for the best pictures of Parisian society under the consulate and empire.

The famous M. Prudnomme attributed the great man's fall to excess of ambition. "If," said he "Napoleon had been content to remain a simple lieutenant of artillery he might now be sitting on the throne of France." Readers of Mme. Junot's gossip will quickly form an opinion that Napoleon's failures were due in a great measure to the badness of his temper. "What a pity that such a great man should be so ill-bred," remarked Talleyrand, after the Emperor had spitefully tweaked his ear in public; and it seems that the emperor had a passion for pulling noses as well as ears. He sometimes pinched Mme. Junot's nose till she shrieked, and even his caresses were so rough that on one occasion he reopened an old wound in Gen. Junot's head by carelessly passing his hand through the wretched man's hair. His paroxysms of rage are said to have been awful, but they did not awe everybody, for when the little tyrant once lifted a cane to strike vice-Admiral Bruat the latter placed a hand on the hilt of his sword and said: "Take care, sir."

Pius VII. again, when a prisoner at Fontainebleau, disconcerted the emperor by placid sarcasm. Napoleon talking on the Concardat, had worked himself into a great excitement and stamped about the room unfolding his scheme for a Gallican church. The pope waited until he paused for breath and then muttered the one word "Comediante!" Utterly maddened at this the emperor shook his fist, yelled and swore; but the pontiff's only answer was the smile with a pitying sweetness as he whispered "Trogediante!"

Mme. de Stael gave Napoleon a neat retort when, being asked, "Since when have women taken to meddling with politics?" she answered, "Since the republic took to guillotining them;" but Napoleon paid this off another time by telling the sprightly lady that the women he liked best were "those who had most children"—the sting of this lying in the fact that Mme. de Steal had only one child. Such rudeness as this—which was habitual with the emperor, for not a day passed without his saying an unkind thing to somebody at court—provoked a great deal of sullen resentment; and it goes far to explain how when Gen. Malet tried to overthrow the government in 1812 during Napoleon's absence in Russia, he nearly succeeded.

Napoleon inspired terror, but very little love. Mme. Junot, who had known him intimately when he was a boy, says that from childhood his temper was ungovernable, and his character at once envious, jealous, and unforgiving. When one reads that his fellow-pupils at the military school shunned him and actually set influence to work so that he might get a commission before the usual time and so rid them of his company, it ceases to be a matter for surprise that no signs of budding genius were discerned in him. Saveria, the old Corsican nurse in his family, thought him the poorest of five brothers. Even his mother had no presentiment of his splendid destinies; and what is more, when Napoleon seemed master of the world and was distributing thrones among his kinsmen she never thought that this heyday would last. She used to save up money in view of misfortune and made the emperor furious by so doing, though in after years, when a prisoner at St Helena, he was glad enough to be relieved out of her hoardings. There is a finely engraved portrait of Mme. Letitia in this book, and it merits attention because of the striking resemblance which its features bear to those of Napaleon III. On the other hand, there is a most pleasing lifelike head of the Empress Josephine, engraved from a miniature by Isabey. The soft, sensuous look on the pretty creature's face, the artful expression of the eyes and the studied artlessness in the attitude of her arms—all show what an enchantress Josephine must have been when young.

An Unsuccessful Fashion Editor.

Somehow a fellow will get himself into trouble when he least expects it. A young lady in the rural districts wrote to us asking advice about how to have a dress made. Now, we didn't know any more about a dress than a single man ought to, and didn't know what to say. But we wanted to accommodate her, and so we got a fashion magazine, copied a description of a dress, and sent it to her. Yesterday the queerest creature we ever saw bounced into our office. "Do you see this dress?" she demanded; "I've worn it in here to let you see it. This is the thing you advised me to make; look at it." Then she went on. She had caused the dress to be made up, worn it to the city, expecting it to be right in style, and found it to be a terror. Investigation showed that the magazine was of 1847. We hadn't observed it before. Then there was only one thing for us to do. We told her we were not the editor who wrote the article, and took her to the office of the literary editor, whom we pointed out as the man. Then we fled the office. We hope we shall not see the literary editor for a few days. He is a man of violent impulse, and somebody might get hurt.—[Boston Post.

Entertaining a Burglar.

"A burglar can be a gentleman in manner as well as any one else, and the majority of them are men of refinement. I was at Saratoga a couple of years ago, and strolling into the dining room of a prominent hotel one day I espied one of the most notorious 'knucks' in the business seated by the side of a wealthy banker. I was curious to see how the fellow would behave himself, and sitting close by observed him. It wasn't long before his engaging manner completely won the old banker, and I laughed to myself when I saw the latter introduce him to a member of his family. I kept my eye on him, and later on actually heard the fellow invite him to drive. I could scracely believe the evidence of my senses. When the party returned I took the 'crook' to one side and asked what lay he was on. 'For Heaven's sake,' said he, 'don't give me away, I'm indulging in a little respectability, and the atmosphere is improving my health.' Cracksman, though he was I had never known him to tell a lie, and when he pledged me his word never to take advantage of the old man's hospitality I was willing to believe him."

"Has any harm come of the thing since?"

"On the contrary, good has come of it, for when an attempt was to be made, about six months ago, to break into the banker's residence, this man gave notice to the department, and the thieves were thwarted. So you see there is something in the old saying after all, 'it's better to have the good will of a dog.'"—N. Y. Journal.

Miscellaneous Matters.

Nearly all the submarine cables have been made by English workmen, bought with English money, and laid down by English engineers. The capital of the three companies reaching from London to the countries of the east represents more than 31,000 miles of submarine cables. The English companies own 13,000 miles against 10,000 miles owned by others of the cables between Europe and Brazil with the West India Islands is owned outside of Great Britain.

Madame Hurtrelle, a lady of position in Paris, has been arrested for drunkenness. In defense she said that she read that the surest way of preserving furs from the ravages of moths was to stow them away in an empty spirit cask: She accordingly purchased one and confided it to her cloak. The weather being chilly, she required the garment, and the alcoholic fumes produced intoxication. She was acquitted.

In a recent conversation Representative Carlisle of Kentucky, who two years ago visited parliament, said our house of representatives is in all respects superior to the commons. With the exception of Bright and a few other noted members he thinks that our lower house possesses more intellect than the British house, and that our representatives personally look better, and that more order is observed.

During the war a Masonic lodge at Fredericksburg, Va., was sacked and among the articles carried off was the silver level of a Senior Warden, which was undoubtedly used by Washington, who was a member of the lodge. This interesting weapon was deposited among the archives of Integrity Lodge, of Philadelphia, by Captain Warren J. Young, a former member, together with a memorandum stating that it was to be returned to the Fredericksburg lodge "after the state of Virginia, as a whole, ceases to be in rebellion against the government of the United States." The relic was overlooked until a few weeks ago, when a newly elected secretary discovered it, and, after a fraternal correspondence with his southern brethren, returned it to them.

The Brooklyn Bridge will never pay for itself. The income was $10,060 for the first week, fell to $4,906 in the second, and so on down to $2,567 for the week ending July 12. The daily average is now $366. The opening of the railway will increase the receipts, yet it is believed that whole income, after deducting running expenses, will not pay one-quarter of the interest on the cost of construction, to say nothing of the sinking fund to meet the principal of the bonds when they fall due. Brooklyn's share of yearly interest is $679,360, and New York's $339,675. The former must raise $150,000 annually for a bridge bond sinking fund, and the latter $75,000. The cost of maintenance is $150,000, so that the yearly burden is $1,394,025. The tax-payers will be reimbursed for their outlay by the general benefits which the bridge will confer upon the two cities.

Memphis has recently enjoyed one of those judicial inquiries into the intoxicating or non-intoxicating quality of beer which periodically result in proving nothing at all. Mr. F. Ball was charged with selling beer on certain occasion in violation of a statute, and, of course, his defense was that no one could get drunk on beer. Numerous German experts testified that a man could drink from twenty-five to eighty glasses a day with impunity, or even 100 glasses if he chose to make a hog of himself. In rebuttal an American witness declared upon oath and without blushing that on the Glorious Fourth he had imbibed nine glasses after 2 p. m. and that when the clock struck 5 he was blind drunk. At this point the case went to the jury, whose verdict has not yet been announced in this city. The trial of this cause is chiefly valuable for the compact and comprehensive definition of drunkeness which it elicited from one of the witnesses. "A man is drunk," said he, "when he don't know what he is thinking about."

Recent statistics in regard to the English army do not show it to be in a very flourishing condition. At home the army is more than 8000 below its appointed strength, and at the end of the present year there will be a deficiency of between 15,000 and 16,000 men, which will be increased to between 25,000 and 30,000 next year. The Brigade of Guards is nearly 1000 men below its strength. Crime is on the increase; cases of violence to superiors and insubordination have increased since 1872 by 57 per cent. in the army at home, and by 67 per cent. in the army abroad, and in the same period the number of men tried for being drunk on duty has more than doubled. The non-commissioned officers also have deteriorated in the last ten years, the record of cases of reduction to the ranks and imprisonment having nearly trebled at home and abroad. The Inspector General of Recruiting is quoted to prove there is a steady falling off in the physical condition of persons who come forward as recruits.

A Great Actor's Illness.

William M. Conner, John McCullough's manager, says of the latter's illness: "He had not been sick before in twenty years, and when this illness attacked him it drove him wild, because of the thought that he would have to disappoint an audience, something that he never did before. He had to do it, though, and, not getting better, he left Cleveland for Quincy, where for the past two months he has been recuperating, knocking around with Carson, Jim Singleton, and others. If you remember, about the 1st of last August he joined General Sheridan at Chicago and accompanied him and his staff through the Yellow-stone campaign. Instead of doing this he should have taken a rest. Thirty days in the saddle was too much for him, and while General Sheridan and others luxuriated in it, he, not being used to riding, suffered greatly from it. He had to rush back to Detroit to join his company, and opened there September 4. Taken in conjunction with the hard work of the season, it disordered his nervous system, and the consequence was he broke down."

Romance of a Battle Field.

A very accomplished and beautiful young lady, Miss Ida Henry, of Martinsburg, Va., was left an orphan on the battlefield of Manassas in the first Bull Run engagement. The home of her parents was at one time directly between the fire of both armies. As the first shots whistled above the house the parents started to flee for a place of refuge. A dozen yards from the door both were shot down, and the baby, an orphan, without sister or brother, was alone in the world. The battle raged on, dead and dying were everywhere, but the baby was unharmed. The day wore away, and just as the sun's last rays, half hidden in the curling smoke, sadly kissed the earth good night, General Jubal Early, riding by, heard the baby's cries. He dismounted, and, taking the little waif up, cared for it until he could place it under the care of his sisters. They watched it through its infantile years, giving it an education and a world of love, and now that baby, grown to womanhood, lovely and accomplished, the pet of a wide circle of friends, who call her "Waif," is the sole support of these two women, sisters of the rebel general.

The Draft Riots of 1863.

From Morgan Dix's Memoir of His Father, General Dix.

The story of those terrible days of July has been fully told; I shall not give it here, though an eye-witness of the confused and bloody scene. The trouble began, as I have said on Saturday, the 11th; nearly a week had passed before we knew that we were safe. I was living at that time in the old rectory of the parish, 50 Varick street. The house stood in a dangerous quarter. The large garden was separated in the rear by a mere brick wall from St. John's lane and York street, which were inhabited almost exclusively by colored people. At St. John's chapel, which stood close by, we had a large Sunday school of colored children. It will be remembered that, by some dull mob-logic, the rioters ascribed the public troubles to the negro, and made that unfortunate race the subject of incessant assaults. Intending to leave the city on Monday, I was stopped by the rumor of coming evil and dared not venture to be absent at that trying time. I remember one of my servants flying into my library that evening, with pale face, and telling me that, while passing through Clarkson street on some errand, she had seen a colored man hanging on a tree, and men and women setting him on fire as he dangled from the branches. I treated the story lightly, and told her it must have been an effigy, but she constantly affirmed that it was true; and said she was right, as I subsequently ascertained. That night, or the following one, the streets behind the rectory were sacked by the mob. I saw their attack from the upper window of my house and heard the bursting in of doors, the crash of glass and the roaring of voices, with shrieks and cries—veritable pandemonium. Next day I learned that an attack was planned on St Joseph's chapel, apparently for no other reason than that we had our colored school there. By prompt application to the authorities I got a watch set on the church, and a squadron of dragoons stood all night drawn up outside my garden wall, ready for the rioters if they should come. Meanwhile, at a dozen different points throughout the city battles were in progress; and never was greater valor displayed than by the police, who threw themselves, lion-like, upon the wild beasts, in the proportion generally of 100 to 5000; taking no prisoners, and strewing the streets with dead and wounded wherever their swift and terrible blows fell. Thus the days wore on, with fire and flame; with sack of private dwellings and burning of charitable institutions, armories and draft stations; with blood and wounds, and every imaginable instance of atrocity on the part of the maddened mob, till regiments hurriedly withdrawn from the front, came speeding back to the city, and we saw the grim batteries and weather-stained and dusty soldiers tramping into our leading streets as if into a town just taken by siege. There was some terrific fighting between the regulars and the insurgents; streets were swept again and again by grape; houses were stormed at the point of the bayonet, rioters were picked off by sharpshooters as they fired on the troops from the house-tops; men were hurled, dying or dead, into the streets by the thoroughly enraged soldiery; until at last, sullen and cowed, and thoroughly whipped and beaten, the miserable wretches gave way at every point and confessed the power of the law. It has never been known how many perished in those awful days. According to the lowest estimate some 1,200 of the rioters must have been killed, and five or six times that number wounded; but they hid their losses as far as possible, and disposed of their dead in silence and darkness.

Somewhat Humorous.

It was the young tailor who said referring to a rival for the affections of a young lady, that he thought he knew enough to be able to cut him out.

American Visitors in England.

London Cable: The Chicago commandery, Knights Templar, are being received with open arms. The hospitalities of York were extended by the lord mayor and a special train conveyed the guests from Liverpool. A banquet in the evening was presided over by the lord mayor. Numerous patriotic and fraternal toasts were made and responded to by English and American knights. Senator Sawyer of Wisconsin was toasted, but excused himself from speaking. Sir Knight O. H. Benton of Minneapolis proposed the health of the lord mayor, who responded by calling for three cheers and a tiger for the visiting sir knights. The affair has been the talk of the country to-day. It was a success in every particular. All are well.

A FRENCH WATERING PLACE

A Place That Was Already Famous Many Centuries Agone, When Gaul Was Yet a Roman Province.

A Healing Resort to Which the Britisher Goes to Get Rid of Gout, and the American for Pleasure.

War and Worship of Buried Ages—A Garden Breakfast Party That Recalls the Repasts of Lucullus.

ROZAT, France, Special Corespondence, July 9.—"What are the French springs and watering-places like?" is the question I am assiduously trying to answer. I had learned enough of American resorts to know that Long Branch is a good place for those sweltered citizens to go who haven't time to go any farther; that Newport is pleasant for those who own a cottage, and are acquainted with other cottages; that Saratoga is just lovely for those who wish to exhibit their dresses and diamonds to the best advantage, and are fond of spring water and weather like Tophet; that Richfield is delightful for those who have cutaneous or digestion diseases, and for ladies who want to go where the sex is alone by a large majority; that Nantucket is good for nobody, and that the White mountains, Mount Desert and the Thousand Islands are good for everybody. But of French facilities I was comparatively ignorant one short week ago. In these few days I have learned something of Rozat. Five years ago Rozat was scarcely known outside of France as a watering place. A few English, attracted by its repute for healing gout and rheumatism, came first, and they have been followed by Americans, till the village of 450 has grown to some thousands during this season, excelling in popularity such places as Mont Dore and Aix les Bains, and successfully rivaling Vichy and even Ems, which, in the quality of mineral springs, it much resembles. It is in the Auvergne district, in the volcanic regions of Central France, the truncated cones of extinct volcanoes sitting in mighty clusters around the horizon. The village is located in a mountain defile 1,400 feet above the sea, through which runs a babbling brook, the Tiretaine, from the side of the Puy de Dome, towering far above. The railroad now runs through the town, the cars climbing up from St. Germain by a sinuous path. Mountains rise on every hand, as they do around the Profile house, New Hampshire, the Puy de Dome being no less in height than Mount Lafayette, and Mont Dore about equaling Mount Washington. This was an old Roman town. The valley abounds in Roman ruins, most of them recently unearthed and identified. Two or three years ago four large baths were uncovered in the very middle of the town, each 20x40 feet square, lined with marble and built in the solid fashion of the Romans; and near by them is a large artificial cavern in which is a tremendous boiling mineral spring, yielding 300 gallons a minute, which undoubtedly supplied the baths. Its broad roof is not arched but horizontal, and by what knack the Romans fastened its mass of cobble-stones up, so that such a weight could be suspended through all these centuries, is a mystery. A couple of hundred feet above the window where I write rises a hill still called Gergovia, its ancient Gallic name. It is fun to run up there in the morning after coffee and rolls. On its summit and sides was the last great city of the Gauls to resist the Roman arms. Vercingetorix defended it when Julius Cæsar sat down for months before it. At last it yielded. Its garrison was put to the sword. The town was burned, and, like Carthage, swept from the face of the earth. The side of the hill is now covered with vineyards and wheat fields shining in the sun. A farmer set a dog on me there Monday evening for picking four strawberries. Hardly a vestige of the old walls remains among the blistered volcanic rock that crown its summit. Cæsar built a town called Nimetum off in the valley here—predecessor of Rozat and Clermont. An old Roman road, now and long since disused, runs from Rozat up the valley towards the Puy de Dome. It is the only country road in all France, perhaps, that is paved; and its pavement was made, not of the basaltic rock or old scoria of which the surrounding cliffs principally consist, but of bowlders and irregular stones of granite, gneiss and mica schist, that must have been brought from a distance. I followed this queer old paved path up through the fields and woods Wednesday, toward the great summit, and wondered if the Romans compelled their galley slaves to build this road, that they might drag over it, to the peak of the Puy de Dome, those colossal statues and mighty monuments which Christian centuries have done their utmost to destroy. Some peasant women, walking down the road, were asked if the Romans really built it. The leader of the party said: "I do not know; I never heard of such a thing." "What was it made for," she was asked, "running down through here with fences built across it? What is it good for?" "I do not know," she repeated, adding, "I never thought about it."

HISTORIC GROUND.

On Friday I drove up to the base of the Puy de Dome and climbed it to visit one of the principal shrines of old Rome—old Rome before the time of Christ. There is nothing finer of its kind in Europe than the drive [illegible] where were spread the still majestic ruins of the temple which the Romans erected to Mercury. The excavation is recent and partial, but enough is brought to light to place this among the most imposing ruins in France. The size and form of many chambers are restored; long galleries are unearthed, portions of some subterranean way; huge flights of steps front the sun, constructed of massive cubes of hard stone five or six feet in diameter, the outer edge worn off by the attrition of ages; remains of reservoirs and aqueducts reappear, built without mortar, but the stones so closely jointed as to hold water. Where those stones came from and how they were got into place—these are are among the hard nuts for scientific men to crack.

A COLOSSAL STATUE.

Here, upon this magnificent base, at once temple and pedestal, stood, 2,000 years ago, the mighty bronze statue to Mercury, the god of commerce, seventy feet high, and second only in its dimensions to the Colossus of Rhodes. Many of the works of antiquity allude to this statue, and Pliny the Elder wrote of it:

> The statue of Mercury, executed by Zenodorus, in a city in the Auvernes in Gaul, under the presidency of Vibius Avitus, surpasses, in the grandeur of its dimensions, all gigantic statues made in our day.

Pliny was buried beneath the great eruption of Vesuvius—if my memory serves me correctly—about 79 of our era; and as the statue seems to have been widely known then, it was probably made considerably earlier, probably under the Roman republic, before Julius Cæsar made his visit to this country. The writer added that the statue was so excellent that Nero wanted it removed to Rome as a statue of himself, but finally compromised by fetching the artist (apparently a Greek) to Rome and having another great statue made there. For centuries it was worshiped. During all the holy days of every year the people of this part of France assembled here, with great effort climbed up to the mountain summit, and there participated in the rites of a fantastic religion. When Christianity came war between the advocates of the two religious broke out fiercely. They fought desperately, and those dark centuries come down to us in an unbroken chronicle of persecution, blood and misery. At last the church was triumphant, and it celebrated the victory by destroying every relic of the old religion it could lay hand on. The statue of Mercury was torn from its height and melted up; only bits of it escaping to be preserved in the museum of Clermont, where they may now be seen. These were found only recently. It was not known that the statue of Zenodorus was located on the Puy de Dome, but a terrific blast of lightning struck the peak a few years ago, tore off some overlying vegetation, and brought to light the ruins of the temple I have spoken of, with other great blocks bearing inscriptions to Mercury and locating the bronze colossus.

The Puy de Dome is also celebrated as the place where Pascal (a native of this village) discovered the laws of atmospheric pressure. The view from the Dome is most inspiring. North and south, along the spurs of the Cevennes, stretches a phalanx of twenty extinct volcanoes, whose concave craters, now filled with grass and flowers, are distinctly visible. Eastward spreads a vast valley, opulent with vegetation and starred with white villages. Between the occasional woods the whole landscape is divided into checkers of deep green and light green and reddish brown; a lake of golden lupin here and there, and on its shores a long, fiery splash of poppies, as if the bronze Mercury had come to life and drawn a vermilion brush across the grass. And all the scene, visited in detail, is full of pretty brooks and mineral springs and tumbling cascades and lovely cool grottoes in the overhanging crystal and basalt. I know no pleasanter place in the world to spend the early months of summer.

Clermont (of which Rozat is a suburb) acquired a detestable fame by being the starting-point of the first crusaders. I visited the cathedral this morning and stood on the platform where, in 1095, Pope Urban II. stood and harangued his great assembly of cardinals and bishops and proclaimed the first crusade for the recovery of Jerusalem. And just outside is a rock by the side of the high wall where Peter the Hermit waved his cross and shouted his frantic appeals to go on that wild and foolish expedition. From here, too, a century later, when billions of dollars had been spent and millions of lives laid down on that quixotic errand, 2,000 or 3,000 unprotected children started to go to Jerusalem and "rescue the holy sepulchre" from the Mohammedans, all by themselves. It was supposed that God would guard them, guide them, feed and clothe them, arm them, and give them victory over "the infidels;" but they suffered fearfully, were beset by starvation, and hundreds were sold as slaves on the African coast. Few ever returned. There is, naturally enough, a good deal of miracle-working all about here. There is the statue of a black Virgin down at the cathedral that works miracles any day when it feels well, without regard to race, color or p. c. of s. It is visited by great crowds of the faithful every week. Over in an adjoining village is an image of the Virgin that was whittled out by the Prophet Jeremiah in his leisure moments, that can work any kind of a miracle with neatness and dispatch.

THE SPRINGS OF ROZAT.

Still, there is a dreadful amount of incredulity poisoning the minds of even the French peasants, and when people are afflicted with real bodily infirmities they skip the Virgin and go for a mineral spring. The mineral springs of Rozat have been famous for 3,000 years. These waters are good for all throat diseases, incipient consumption, skin diseases and rheumatism; but their specialty is gout. If the dear reader has gout, let him come to Rozat. Rozat is death on gout. Enough gout has been left here during the last century to make cripples of the whole army of Peter the Hermit, if it had been absorbed uniformly. All the peasants of the Auvergne are noticeably strong and agile in their legs. This is probably one of the chief reasons why it occurred to them to walk to Jerusalem, before anybody else thought of such a tremendous picnic. The bathing establishment, in the center of a large garden, is one of the finest in the world, containing 140 baths, a large swimming bath, a gymnasium, two bath rooms of carbonic acid, and equipments for inhalation, aspiration, pulverization and gargling. In this park is a magnificent jet of water, the Eugenie spring, which boils out of the earth at a temperature of 95 deg., and with a force equal to that of the Sprudel at Carlsbad. It produces 316,000 gallons in twenty-four hours. A running stream is turned from this [illegible] nectar of Gallic ingenuity, transforming everything. It was a poem in twelve cantos an opera in twelve acts, with a recitative of ragout, a cantata of cream, and a symphony of unutterable things. I remember a tavern sign in Colorado: "25c for a dinner and 50c for a perfect gorge." We were very near a perfect gorge, as I have shown in describing this narrow valley. If I am unable to discribe the individual dishes it is not because I am insensible to their charms, like the fisherman on the coast of Cornwall, in Miss Parr's Adam and Eve, who said: "Some likes thicky and some likes thucky, but as for me it don't make no difference. I'm a perfect epikoor, I am." French gravy-making is one of the fine arts. Its ingredients elude the pen, but I am going to make a study of it under Mere Fournier. The land of a hundred gravies and only one religion should be proud of her; for she has discovered, like several other chiefs up and down this valley, how to give the human palate a new sensation. With the recollection of my first boots, my first circus-going, my first courting and other sweet memories I have packed away, in the choicest convolutions of my brain, the breakfast in her Bower of bliss. And I am sure there are two classes of persons who ought to come to Rozat—those who are sick and those who are well.

HOW LONDON LADIES DRESS.

The Various Costumes to Be Seen at the Places Frequented by Fashion's Followers—A Glimpse of a Pretty Salvationist, with Other Notes About Town.

LONDON, Special Correspondence, July 14. I was lured into another bazaar the other day. It was for the benefit of a poor dear church, and was given on the grounds belonging to a private house. It was worse than all the others, and the ladies who begged you to buy this or that were old, ugly, and vilely dressed. I bought because I was forced to an ugly little statue, and I have placed it in my private den where I can shake my fist and scowl at it to my heart's content, I mean to tell you about one dress worn the first day by the very largest and ugliest stallkeeper, and then I will be good and tell you all manner of pleasant things. The foundation was the very heaviest black satin; down the front of the underskirt were ponderous looking flounces, edged with gold lace; the over garment was gold birds, beasts and fowls crawling over a black satin surface. This was made more hideous by yards and yards of the same gold lace; a large leghorn hat was trimmed with a wreath of lemons and oranges, life-size. Around the neck a cable of gold was hung, and on various parts of the person's person were pieces of gold jewelry; the day was hot, very hot; the perspiration poured down the red face of the woman who wore this dancing costume, and I bought the ugly little statue of her. Do you wonder I scowl and shake my fist at it?

CONCERT COSTUMES.

The state concert last week was attended by a brilliant throng of people. Patti did not sing but Lucca, Valleria and Trebelli did so. There was no lack of superb music. As at all affairs where royalty attends there was much magnificent dressing. The princess of Wales wore pearl embroidered white velvet, and quantities of pearls and diamonds. Princess Beatrice pink and white and Princess Christian mauve and roses. A very rich dress worn by a fresh-looking young girl was white tulle, with gold embroidery glued on, any attempt to sew drawing out of shape either the tulle or the embroidery. Her ornaments were white flowers and nothing else. A dress of pale blue worn under black Spanish lace and looped with crimson roses and blue feathers was odd but very handsome and striking. A number of young ladies presented this year were the purest, simplest white, with ribbons and flowers; in some cases a few jewels, and those pearls. A party of gayly and gorgeously attired Indian princes attracted considerable attention. These dresses were richly adorned with jewels of every description. One prince wore a ruby on his wrist, almost as large as the one in the royal crown in the glass case in the Tower of London. It was surrounded with diamonds the size of a marrowfat pea.

GARDEN PARTY GOWNS.

At a recent garden party the majority of the costumes worn were of thin material; one, a cream nun's veiling, had red embroidery, the design in bunches of currants. The bonnet was made of red currants, and a corsage bouquet of the same fruit was worn—a very pretty costume, but the long red gloves and vivid parasol almost spoiled it. A dress of snowy white muslin with much lace and many ribbons looked really cool and charming. The parasol was especially pretty, being made of white muslin embroidered all over white daisies, the hat was large and covered with ostrich plumes; the gloves, long white silk ones. One lady looked one huge blush, her gown, shoes, hat, and gloves being of crimson. Another looked like a piece of sky, her color being blue from head to foot. An underskirt made of yellow lace flounces and worn with a red velvet bodice, looked very nice on a pretty brunette, and another of pink crepe, with a claret plush bodice, looked equally well on a very fair blonde. A dark stone color veiling, with a few hundred sequins sewn all over—it just escaped, by a hair's breadth, grotesqueness. A handsome woman who wore a thin black dress and a Barcelona lace mantel had but one touch of color about her, and that touch was a cluster of most natural-looking water lilies that was placed on the side of her parasol.

Hyde park is full of carriages every afternoon between the hours of 5 and 6. It is enough to make one color blind to watch the numerous combinations that dash past. I saw one the other day of dark-blue and light-green, trimmed with an emerald-looking passementerie. The bonnet seemed made of emeralds, it glistened in he sun so brightly. I discovered however, that it was composed of crystalized bulbs. Pretty Mrs. Burton Baker wore a charming sateen dress of dark garnet and light pink, the trimming consisting of fifty yards of creamy lace; fact—she told me so herself. The fifty yards of lace was disposed most gracefully about the gown, and I guess there was enough left for a bonnet, for she wore one made of the same lace on her light brown-haired head. I saw a very elegant costume on a lady walking. The underskirt [illegible]

PROSPEROUS PEN DRIVERS.

Concerning Noted Newsmongers Who Tickle the Taste of the Curious by Furnishing the Gossip of Gotham.

The Comfortable Incomes Earned by the Poet of the Sierras and the Omniscent and Reminiscent Gath.

Also a Glimpse of Genial Joe Howard, the Old but Never-Aging Nestor of Journalists.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, July 21.—I have already told you some of the things I know about Gotham and its newspapers, and if you found those statements interesting perhaps you would like to go into the question a little further, and hear something of the large and in some respects curious body of men who furnish New York correspondence to newspapers printed in various parts of the country. There are a good many men—and women too—who make a more or less sumptuous living in this way, and there are a good many more who by means of metropolitan correspondence add largely to incomes gained in other directions. Joaquin Miller, George Alfred Townsend, Joe Howard, old New York Frothingham, Jennie June Croly, Annie Wakeman, Janet Gilder, and a raft of others, make it their business to tell the countless thousands out of Gotham what is going on here—and a good deal that isn't. Some of these folks are worth writing about. Some of them are not. Take the case of a man like Miller—often an interesting writer of prose, always an attractive talker about the wild life of the extreme West, certainly a poet by nature, and generally as full of eccentricity as a locomotive with a wheel off, Miller cuts a striking figure wherever he goes. His present occupation is the furnishing of ten rural journals with a weekly letter written in manifold. In addition to this he turns up a random poem now and then, and he makes in all about $7,000 a year. His letters bring him $10 apiece, so that for actually writing a column and a half of matter with a manifold pencil, he receives the handsome sum of $100 a week—which is better pay in comparison with the actual work done than any other writer in America receives. I believe the Sierran poet has also had a hand recently in a new comedy for Annie Pixley—a piece of work in which he went "cahoots" with Archie Gordon, who is one of the cleverest and brightest writers in New York. Long ago Miller ceased to receive royalties from the Danites. His contract called for a nightly sum until the total of $10,000 should be reached. He received the final $500 two years ago, and has never turned out another cohesive dramatic work, though I believe he is all the time doing something in the dramatic line. Miller's long hair of former days has yielded to the persuasive shears of the barber, and he is getting to be slightly bald. But he wears his blonde beard just the same, and has never forsaken his slouched felt hat. Miller has a fine large head and a game leg. He got his latter adornment, he says, through the agency of some Modoc bullets. For a long time he lived in a flat in New York, his only attendant being a colored boy who vainly tried to keep the place in order, while Miller did the cooking, slept on the floor rolled up in a buffalo robe, broke the necks from his bottles in preference to using a corkscrew, and otherwise conducted his daily life in a way vaguely reminiscent of his former times on the border. The greatest mistake Miller ever made was in not staying in London the first time he went over. He was a lion on that side of the water, where the quaint freshness of his poems struck forcibly upon the minds of readers unaccustomed to his method. He came back here, was considerably guyed, and for some years lived in more or less poverty. But there proved to be more stuff in him than he was given credit for, and he finally came down to solid, hard work, after giving up the silly notion that he had been intended by high heaven to represent the great American nation as minister to the court of St. James. Miller is pretty well fixed at present, and I hardly think he is likely to lose his head again. He is one of those rarely-found men who have lived down the animosities of early life, and whose excentricities, if pronounced, are at least innocent.

GATH.

Another sort of bird is George Alfred Townsend. You know him, of course. He writes over the name of Gath, and he slings personalities around him with a free hand. In consequence, he has made a great many enemies. What is more, Gath doesn't always mind what he says. Of course, he doesn't tell downright whoppers you know, but some of his truths have an India rubber attachment, for the sake of convenience, that is exceptionally aggravating at times. Not long ago Gath went after Joe Howard with some statements about the latter's private relations, which were not strictly governed by the facts of the case. In response to this, a friend of Howard's interviewed Gath according to the rules of the Boston prize ring. In other words, Gath was knocked out in one round. A sarcastic journalist said to me that night, "Townsend won't fight. He belongs to the ambulance corps of journalism—goes around with a Geneva cross on his arm, picking up the wounded." Nevertheless, Townsend is an attractive cuss. He writes more matter than [illegible] indexed with the letter beginning this man's name, and finds all he has accumulated there concerning him. As he reads every newspaper that comes along, and clips out all personal matters, or matters bearing upon persons, he has drawn together a tremendous amount of information about everybody who has been in the papers at all since he began this sort of thing. I suppose his scrap book-system is the most complete thing of its kind in America, or in the world. When he reads over his book, he sits down and telegraphs all he can find, or invent, that makes good reading. He seems to have taken the clipping notion from Charles Reade, who is well-known to have conducted operations on this line ever since he was a youngster. Reade, however, does not go in for personal information, of course, because he is not in journalism. Reade's scheme is to cut out from the papers every interesting incident he can find, and every one of those curious complications of human life which he came across every few days in the reading of every large journal, wherever published. Reade also keeps a complete list of the newspaper reports of great crimes. He will take one of these crimes as the basis of a novel, and out of it he can draw a plot of great vigor and depth.

Townsend is a stout man, of medium height, with florid complexion, and a quiet manner. He usually wears a Prince Albert coat, dark trousers, and a plug hat. He has a dark moustache and gray eyes. His nose turns slightly downwards at the end, and his hair is brown. It is a singular thing that a man who can talk so well to short-hand writers makes so bad a speech after dinner. But an after-dinner speech, when you come to think of it, is about the hardest thing on earth to do in a satisfactory manner. Townsend usually gets around it by making two or three introductory remarks, winding up with saying that he cannot at this time fix his mind upon any particular thread, but that instead of making a speech he will, if his hearers consent, recite a few verses of his own composition. He then gives them Little Grisette—a rhymed story of the sort of life in Paris which everybody reads about and nobody gets a look at. The little grisettes I saw in Paris had big feet and big hands, and were abnormally addicted to the use of intoxicants. If the students in the Latin quarter like that sort of thing they can have it, so far as any civilized human being is concerned. However, Mr. Townsend's poem is full of life and very well written, but it is too ideal to be at all realistic. He recites it very well, between puffs at his after-dinner cigar. It is a good scheme to have something of this kind always on tap, and to have a proprietary interest in it that will keep anybody else from collaring its idea.

GENTLE JOE HOWARD.

While I am about it, I might as well tell you something of the other actors in this little Howard-Townsend episode. It has always struck me, by the by, as rather curious that journalists do not fight oftener. No class of men on earth say bitterer things about each other, and none feel so badly when they are attacked. I suppose Joe Howard has fired off as many tough epigrams at different people in America as anybody. Howard was the boss editor of the New York Star, at the beginning of that paper's career. He made things pretty lively around Printing House square while he was down there. The first thing done by Howard to attract general attention was the framing of the bogus proclamation, puporting to have been signed by Abraham Lincoln, for which Joe was sent down the harbor and kept in irons for a long time. That was during the war. Even under these trying circumstances he was full of good nature and generosity. Some other chap, who was arrested at the same time and went down with Joe, didn't have a penny to his name. Howard found in the bottom of one of his pockets, rolled up so small that you could have put it in a goose-quill, a $100 greenback, which, with the wise foresight of that kind of journalism to which he is addicted, he had put there out of reach. This he produced, and during his stay down at the fort, dragging a ball and chair around, he "whacked up" with his companion, not because he had known him, or had been a friend of his, but simply because he was a fellow prisoner in the same hot water he himself was floundering through. Joe is one of the most versatile and inexhaustible writers in America; although he has written until the hair is all off his head, and although he can remember back so far that everybody who has only been in journalism a simple matter of half a century or so, looks upon him as a patriarch. Joseph is one of the most energetic and hard-working men in the profession, and he earns a lot of money. When he left the Star he went to the Herald, where his salary was fixed at $150 a week. He sends the Philadelphia Press a letter for every Sunday, which pays him $20. It is a pretty tart letter, but it brings readers to the Press office, and that settles its value in the publishers' eyes. Every now and then, too, I notice some work over his signature in the Boston Herald and Chicago News. I don't know what other papers he writes for, but he does some work for commercial houses in New York. Altogether his income runs from $12,000 to $20,000 a year. Howard is one of the gentlest and nicest chaps in all ways, anybody can wish to know. I am not acquainted with a single man in journalism, barring Townsend, who feels resentment enough against Joe Howard to give him a rub of serious import in a newspaper. He had lots of enemies at the time he ran the Star in the interest of Bill Tweed and that clique. But by his genuine good humor and unfaltering clinging to all those who have been friends of his, Joseph has lived down every particle of ill-nature there ever was against him. He works in a chaotic and spasmodic sort of way, but manages to turn out interesting material all the time. There is about as much system to him as there is to a dynamite bomb. He bursts out into an article and spreads over pretty much the entire surrounding territory, but he seldoms shows any violent hostility for anybody, and his extremely wide knowledge of men gives him value to a paper like the Herald where his position is of that semi-editorial type which allows him a good deal of swing. Whenever any big thing occurs anywhere in the country, Howard is sent to "do" it. During the last presidential contest he had charge of the campaign. He came out of it smiling, contented, full of friends and affluent. He knows every trick and rope of journalism, and he pulls them all with equal success.

PIRATE'S BURIED TREASURE

The Crew of the Dolly D. Discover the Darksome Den of Dungeon Rock the Retreat of Pirate Veal.

The Interesting Tale of the Life, Adventures and Sudden Taking Off of the Old Robber King.

The Wealth of Precious Treasures Buried Beneath the Rock—Fruitless Attempts to Discover Them.

LYNN, Mass., Special Correspondence, July 25.—To-day we deserted the Dolly D., and leaving her at anchor in Lynn harbor, went above to look over the city of shoes, the home of old Troll Pitcher and the third plantation of the old Puritan days. Lynn is a wide-awake city with a wide-awake population, and she manufactures more boots and shoes than any two cities in the United States. But we did not pay it a visit altogether in order to examine the various manufactories—we were after something more romantic and mysterious. Dungeon rock, with its traditions of buried treasure and the inhumed pirate, Thomas Veal, who sang with his cut throat companions in the early part of the sixteenth century:

"We buried them on the island shore,
All under the blasted tree:
But their gold we hid in our secret store;
Ho! Gold and red blood for me—" was our destination, for we were determined to view this wild and picturesque spot, and tread the rocky path hewn into its very heart by the Marbles, father and son, whose exhibition of energy and perseverance, made in the vain search for the buried treasure, was something wonderful. Dungeon rock was once a favorite place to visit, but within the past two or three years it has dropped out of sight; and it is only now and then a sightseer journeys to the interesting spot. It is three or four miles north of the city, and by means of a barge we reached it in good time. I doubt if a wilder spot could be found in the old Bay State, and be at the same time so picturesquely beautiful, as this. The rock itself is an immense cliff of Newfoundland granite, surrounded on all sides by massive bowlders, while for a mile around are rocky hills, dark, thick woods and deep, shady glens, seldom visited by men, and which seem to be kept sacred to the memory of the savage Indian who once lived within its boundaries.

THE PIRATE VEAL.

But to begin its history, which is rapidly being forgotten, even by those who live nearest it. In the early part of 1600, a band of bold buccaneers entered Lynn harbor in their vessel and anchored near the mouth of the Saugus river. A party of four, with their baggage and several small, iron-bound chests, were rowed ashore and took up their residence in what is now called Pirate's glen, a mile or two from Dungeon rock. The glen was a deep, narrow valley, shut in on two sides by high walls and craggy, precipitous rock, and shrouded on the other by thick pines, hemlocks and cedars, between which there was only one small spot which the rays of the sun at noon could penetrate, It was understood by the settlers that these freebooters had become tired of their wild life upon the seas, and had retired upon the money they had accumulated. The pirates were rarely ever seen by the settlers, who, as long as they remained unmolested, cared nothing about them. Their retreat was at last discovered by an English cruiser which was in search of them, and three were captured and taken back to England. The fourth, Thomas Veal, escaped, taking with him all the treasure, which was said to consist of jewels, trinkets and ware of precious metal, and gold and silver coin. His hiding place was in a large double cave beneath an enormous jagged rock, which threatened constantly to topple over and forever close up the entrance to the cave. The hill upon which the rock was situated was at times surrounded by an almost impenetrable swamp and forest. Here Veal lived for years, entirely alone, making, when it suited his pleasure, coarse, homely shoes, which he sold to the settlers or exchanged for the necessities of life. Many wondered why he worked at all if he had chests of treasure, but others answered that the treasure was in such form as not to be readily spent, and that he perhaps worked to pass away the lonely hours in his cave, for he rarely had a visitor. Veal frequently paid for goods with Spanish coin, and he had costly articles of jewelry on him. On Dec. 14, 1658, one of the settlers named Joel Dunn, went into the woods upon Dungeon Rock hill to cut wood. Before he had finished his work night had closed in, and with it came a terrible storm, the equal of which the settler had never before experienced. Knowing that it would be almost impossible to return to the settlement, and fearing to stay in the woods, lest he be killed by falling trees, Dunn bethought himself of the pirate's cave, and went there. He was hospitably received by Veal, who built a rousing fire and prepared a plain, but substantial supper. The cave, as Dunn afterward described it, was a double one, quite large. The walls were grim with smoke, and the floor quite rough in places. In the main part there was a large table of rude workmanship, two or three scraggy tree stumps used for seats, and rough shoemaker's bench, illy supplied with tools. In one corner stood an old Spanish musket, and near the blackened fireplace were a few broken and otherwise dilapidated cooking utensils. Upon the large table previously mentioned, was a broken earthen dish, a rusty knife, a wooden spoon, a pistol, a dirk, a hatchet, a shoemaker's hammer, and a few other articles. In a large clam shell were a few [illegible]

it to a friend, he was told by him that he thought the place meant was Dungeon rock, Lynn. Marble, upon hearing the whole history of the rock, became interested, and visited the spot. He discovered a large open seam in the rock, which he thought would lead to the cave, and that same year, with his son Edwin and two other men, he began a determined assault upon the mass of stone, which neither he nor his son ceased to continue until death prevented. For a year all hands labored hard on the tunnel they had made, which was to lead to the cave, but the two men became discouraged, lost faith and stopped work. But the Marbles were not disheartened in the least; on the contrary, they redoubled their exertions to secure the treasure.

A DETERMINED SEARCH.

They purchased the entire rock and surroundings of the then town of Lynn, and steadily but slowly increased the depth of their excavations. It was hard work, and few men would have persisted in the undertaking, as father and son did. The rock is of the hardest kind, and abounds in crystals and feldspar. They had nothing to work with but a drill or two and a sledge hammer. The son would hold the drill while the father wielded the sledge, relieving each other at intervals. After a blast the fragments of rock would be shoveled into a basket, and then one or the other would climb laboriously up the winding and uneven path they had made, with it upon his shoulder, and dump it outside. They persevered for a year longer, when something occurred which gave them new hope and increased their faith. It was the elder Marble's habit to consult mediums at regular intervals, who directed him in his work. On one occasion he was told that within a certain number of hours he would find something in the rock that would greatly encourage him to proceed. Four days later an ancient-looking, rusty sword, with a leather-wound haft and a brass-bound scabbard was found in a large seam inside the rock. Soon after being exposed to the air the leather upon the handle crumbled away, and the thick, blue mould on the brass began to wear off. Father and son worked on summer and winter, year in and year out, living in a small hut near the mouth of the tunnel, and subsisting upon what could be purchased with the small sums of money presented them by visitors. Many a time hunger stared them in the face, but something, providentially, always turned up to prevent them from starving. Five long years they toiled together, then five more without making the discovery they expected. The ten years changed to fifteen, and still no treasure. But the wonderful faith of the Marbles was not shaken in the least. Two years later, Nov. 10, after having labored unceasingly for seventeen years, the father, Hiram, died, aged sixty-three, without having laid eyes upon the silver and gold he had dug so deep into the heart of the rock for. To the very last he believed that treasure was buried beneath the rock, and that sometime it would be found. But Edwin, the son, continued the work upon the tunnel alone. He drilled, blasted and carried out rock unaided, increasing its length from year to year, but never reaching the pirate's cave or its treasure. He was a spiritualist, and believed everything about the cave that came through mediums. He was a very patient worker, cheerful and hopeful, and determined in his object. Neither argument or criticism moved him in the least, and for eleven years longer he continued to delve in the stony depths. But he secured not his reward, and died Jan. 10, 1880, of paralysis, brought on by hard and persistent labor in the dark, damp excavation upon which he had spent nearly all of his years, having entered upon the work when but twenty. Weird and solemn services were held by the spiritualists over the remains within the silent depths of the forest near the opening of the tunnel, surrounded by snow and ice. The body of young Marble, at his request, was interred near the foot of Dungeon rock on the southwest slope, close to the scene of his life's hopeful, but fruitless labors. But when the sledge and drill was laid down forever by Edwin, there was no one to take it up, and the cavern has not been invaded except by visitors. The female Marbles who lived in the hut near the tunnel through all the long years, were as strong in their faith as the men, and have not yet deserted the rock. As our party approached Dungeon rock we could plainly see the effects of the ancient earthquake in the massive fragments of rock scattered about, the huge bowlders and the rifts and chasms in different parts. We were taken in charge by one of the relatives of the dauntless diggers gone before, who told us the history of the rock and showed us the old sword and scabbard found within it. For a small fee we were taken into the excavation, through a winding passage eight feet in height, eight in width and seventy-eight in length, the walls of which were moist and cold and the pathway ragged. The tunnel winds around as it descends, and the end, where the last blow was struck only three years ago, is sixty-five feet in perpendicular depth from the surface and directly under the spot where the first blow was struck thirty-one years ago. We were also shown the crevice where the sword was found, but the impression it had made in a clayey soil, which had hardened into rock in the nearly 200 years, was not to be seen as it had been destroyed in a search made for more relics. The visit we paid the excavation was a most interesting one, and when sixty-five feet beneath the surface of the earth, surrounded by the rocky and threatening walls, I could not help shuddering and thinking what if the malicious spirit of the old pirate, Thomas Veal, should bar our passage back to the open sunlight, or should drop a huge bowlder from above, and thus entomb us alive, as he himself was entombed. But there were no spirit manifestations of any description, and we reached the surface in safety.

Foreign Bondholders.

Since the census clerks waded through the books of the register of the treasury, three years ago, to ascertain how many of our bonds are held abroad, no positive information has been given on that point. The treasurer knows how much money he sends to foreign holders every quarter in the payment of interest on United States bonds, but that does not tell the whole story. Large numbers of foreign holders do not receive their interest direct. It goes to representatives in New York, and is by them forwarded. It is not known what proportion of foreign holders of govern- [illegible]

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Minnesota Democratic State Convention.

The State convention of Minnesota democrats at St. Paul on the 2d inst., was the largest for several years. Hon. C. F. Buck was president and O. H. Leinau and S. S. McKinney, secretaries.

Mayor Ames of Minneapolis, who had been suggested for governor by the Hennepin delegations, declined to run and placed in nomination Hon. W. W. McNair of Minneapolis. R. A. Jones of Rochester nominated Adolph Bierman of Rochester. The convention then proceeded to an informal vote by counties on the nominations, with the following result: McNair, 132; Bierman, 125. Upon the announcement of the result, R. A. Jones arose, and on behalf of Mr. Bierman, moved that the nomination of Mr. McNair be made unanimous, which motion prevailed.

R. L. Frazee of Frazee City was nominated for Lieutenant Governor; James J. Green of Le Sueur for Secretary of State; John Ludwig of Winona for State Treasurer; John W. Willis of Ramsey county for Attorney General; A. T. Lindholm of Washington county for Railroad Commissioner. The following platform was unanimously adopted:

We, the democracy of Minnesota, in convention assembled, reaffirm our devotion to the time-honored maxims of the democratic party, that that government is best which governs least; which leaves the citizen in the enjoyment of the greatest personal liberty consistent with the rights of others and public welfare; and while it affords full protection to life and property, allows the creeds, business and customs of the people to remain unfettered by sumptuary laws, class legislation and extortionate monopolis.

First—That every species of taxation levied upon the many for the profit of the few, creating monopolies and producing a revenue in excess of the wants of the government, economically administered, is unjust, tyrannical and dangerous. Sound policy requires that the business of the people should be free from oppressive duties and vexatious restraints, and that all legislation in reference thereto should be impartial in its objects and equal in its burdens. We, therefore, favor such a thorough revision of the present tariff laws as will remedy existing evils and result in the establishment of a tariff for revenue only, as the permanent commercial policy of this country.

Second—That constitutions are made to protect the minority of the people against the encroachments of the majority; that no proposition for change of or amendment to the organic law of the state should be entertained or submitted to a vote of the people, which, if adopted by the majority, would prevent the minority from exercising their inherent and inalienable rights. That we consider the enactment of sumptuary and prohibitory laws a subversion of the rights of the people and that we are unalterably opposed to them.

Third—That we appreciate the importance of liberal appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi river; but, inasmuch as the river and harbor bill has, under republican administrations, become an "omnibus" for the corrupt combinations by members of congress, we would favor the adoption of an amendment to the constitution conferring upon the president the power to veto such provision of the river and harbor bill, and all other appropriation bills, as, in his judgment, are unwarranted.

Fourth—That the patent laws should be revised, to the end that the innocent purchasers of manufactured articles, using the same in good faith, shall be protected from harassing and oppressive suits for the infringement of patent rights.

Resolved, That the maintenance in power of any political party for an undue length of time tends to an assumption of power inconsistent with democratic principles of government, and is dangerous to the rights of the people; and we, therefore, urge upon the electors of this state, that they carefully investigate the existing state of things with reference to change of state administration, in their own interests.

Approbation for Arthur.

CHICAGO, Special Telegram, Aug. 3.—The Daily News recently sent out a circular letter to representative men in different parts of the country asking their judgment on President Arthur's administration. The letters were addressed: First, to all of the delegates to the Chicago convention still living; second, to all the senators and members of congress; third, to the presidents of a number of the leading colleges, and, finally, to a miscellaneous company of distinguished gentlemen in the different professions.

The replies from Minnesota are as follows:

I think the wise, conservative and dignified administration of President Arthur has fully met the expectation of his friends, and commands the respect and admiration of his enemies. Adherence to this same conservative yet independent policy, will, undoubtedly, unite both wings of the Republican party and bring them to the front stronger and more united than ever. D. M. SABIN.

President Arthur's administration has proved to be much better than we anticipated. While he is not the style of man we would have chosen, we have no disposition to find fault with him. In short, we are agreeably disappointed in him, and should he continue thus to the end his administration must certainly be classed among the best in the history of this country. We think it might be improved a little by modernizing the attorney general's department. D. C. JOHNS, Hamline, Minn.

The public sentiment of the country, which at first regarded President Arthur's administration with a degree of suspicion, appears at length to be awakening to a calm consciousness that there is something decidedly good in the man after all. The quiet conservatism with which he has encouraged timely reforms in civil administration, the freedom from corruption and scandal, and the even temper, good judgment and dignified and impartial bearing which he has constantly manifested in dealing with the disturbing faction, among the acts which have gradually won for President Arthur the confidence of the country. D. SINCLAIR, Winona.

My father, Mr. E. F. Drake, is at present in Europe; but knowing his views, I would say for him that, although not one of Mr. Arthur's firmest supporters at the time of the nomination, he has since been more than pleased with the able and discreet manner in which he has conducted public affairs during the past two years, showing himself worthy of the people's confidence as chief magistrate of the nation. A. M. DRAKE, St. Paul.

I consider President Arthur's administration eminently wise and statesmanlike. M. WHITE, Chatfield.

The course of our distinguished chief magistrate has from the beginning been characterized in an eminent degree by wise and conciliatory measures, and by a straightforward, clear-sighted policy that fully illustrates the truth that "he serves his party best who best serves his country." J. B. WAKEFIELD, Blue Earth City.

The administration of President Arthur has, in view of all the circumstances surrounding its commencement, been a great success and highly satisfactory to all well-disposed people. Mr. Arthur has not only made a good executive, but a most excellent party chief. He has to a very large extent been instrumental in allaying the bitterness and strife between the so-called half-breeds and stalwarts. KNUTE NELSON, Alexandria.

MINNESOTA'S GRAIN CROPS.

Official Report of Mr. Young of the State Emigration Bureau to the Department of Agriculture.

The Minnesota State statistical agent of the United States agricultural department, in his report for Aug. 1, gives the condition of the crops of this State as follows:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Wheat	102	Buckwheat	96
Corn	87	Potatoes	101
Rye	97	Amber sugar cane	83
Oats	98	Flax	103
Barley	96	Beans	96

The unit representing an average good crop being, in each instance, 100. The returns from southwestern counties, touching the wheat crop, are uniformly good, and but for the damage done by the storm of July 21 would send the average condition for the State several points higher. They also indicate fully average yields for oats, barley, rye and potatoes. The Lac qui Parle correspondent makes an especially favorable return concerning small grains, and says that corn will be more than an average crop, if early frosts do not interfere. Watonwan county correspondent says that crops of all kinds are with them the best they have had in fourteen years. A very careful correspondent in Pipestone county writes that the acres in wheat in that county are one-sixth more than last year, and the yield will be from fifteen to twenty-five bushels per acre; oats forty to seventy bushels per acre, with one-third more acres than last year; barley thirty to forty-five bushels, and rye fifteen to thirty bushels, with considerable increase of acreage. From reports indicate generally good crops. Considerable complaint is made of rust in wheat in some localities, and occasionally of blight. Storms also did a good deal of injury in places, beating the wheat down and rendering it difficult to save. The chinch bugs have likewise damaged some fields. The acres injured by these agencies are, in each instance, small, but make together a significant aggregate. Barley was discolored in consequence of wet weather; the yield otherwise being above an average.

The returns from counties east of the Mississippi river, though favorable, are not so encouraging generally. They report wheat considerably less than an average in yield, though superior in quality. Rye and barley are likewise short, while oats were rather more than average.

From that part of the State north of the Minnesota and west of the Mississippi rivers, and south of the north lines of Big Stone, Swift, Kandiyohi, Meeker and Wright counties, the returns are (with two exceptions) more than usually favorable for wheat, representing the yield either at or above an average. Oats about 94, rye 100, and barley 91 per cent of averages. Corn is marked as low as 76 per cent of an average condition for this time of year, but with the qualification that it is rapidly improving.

For the counties north of the above, (excepting those of the Red river valley), the returns indicate 90 per cent of a good average yield for wheat, and between 90 and 96 per cent for oats, rye and barley. Corn is reported as promising from 85 to 89 per cent of an average, with probability of exceeding this in the event of favorable weather for forty days to come.

RED RIVER VALLEY COUNTIES

return an average 87 per cent as to the condition of wheat in that region, 72 per cent for oats and 84 per cent for barley. All the counties north of latitude 45 deg. 30 min. suffered somewhat from drouth, a circumstance of so rare occurence in that region as to make it one of the phenomena of this somewhat phenomenal season.

One hundred and sixty-nine answers to inquiries as to the probable yields per acre of small grains, on being averaged, give the following results: Wheat, fifteen and three-fourths bushels; oats, forty bushels; rye, fifteen bushels; barley, twenty-five bushels. Allowance remains to be made, however, for injuries resulting from rust, blight, etc., which will slightly reduce these figures, especially as to wheat. The agent gives it as his opinion, based on the reports, that while the wheat crop will be considerably above the average, taking both quantity and quality into consideration, the yield will hardly reach fifteen bushels per acre for the entire State.

Mr. McNair Declines.

The committee appointed by the democratic state convention to wait upon the Hon. W. W. McNair and inform him of his nomination for the governorship of Minnesota have received the following letter of declination.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Aug. 6, 1883, Hon. W. M. Campbell, Dr. A. A. Ames, Hon. R. A. Jones, Committee, Gentlemen: I am deeply grateful for the high honor conferred upon me by the democratic party of our state in naming me at the recent convention as their candidate for governor, to be supported at the next ensuing election. That this distinction was neither sought nor desired by me is a matter generally known and well known to many delegates in that convention, some of whom in compliance with my previous earnest request, informed the convention that I could not accept the nomination if tendered me, and such is yet, after careful consideration of the matter, my decision. The reasons which influence me are of a private character, among others involving my absence from the state at the time of the election, which reason alone, in my opinion, precludes me from accepting the proffered leadership. I therefore cannot accept this nomination, and I ask you to inform the State central committee, when it shall have been constituted and named, of this my decision. Thanking you, gentlemen, for your friendly interest and courtesy in this matter, I remain yours, very respectfully, (Signed) W. W. McNAIR.

The State Committee will name a substitute for Mr. McNair in a short time.

P. F. Lyons, observer for the signal service corps of the United States army, in his report of weather observations made at St. Paul during the month of July, says: The meteoric features of July were remarkable as to temperature, and in one instance phenomical. Of the three other elements viz: Weather and pressure, the first named differed considerably from the average for the last twelve years, while the latter two are about up to the average. The hot wave that generated over the Rocky Mountain region, at the close of last June, is the phenomenal feature referred to above, and the resulting maximum temperature therefrom of 100 degrees at St. Paul on the 1st, is unparalled, and tends to make the first day in July, 1883, memorable in St. Paul's meteorology. The lowest temperature observed during the month was 52 deg. making a monthly range of 48 deg. which is also the greatest range shown by our records. July was the coldest month with one exception on record.

Sugar for Sorghum.

Washington Special: An interesting and valuable report of the department of agriculture has recently been printed. It is entitled Investigation of Sorghum as a Sugar Producing Plant—Season of 1882; Peter Collier, Chemist. The amount of sorghum cane available for Dr. Collier's experiments last year was limited to the product of two-ninths of an acre, upon which sixty-four varieties were planted. Many of these were entirely new to the United States, and experiments as to their value are regarded as specially important, in view of the fact that they had been brought from countries where sorghum had been raised, both for its sugar and its seed, for several hundred years. The average results of the examination made on Dec. 8 showed that in spite of the many frosts, twenty three in all, the first frost being on Nov. 3, the amount of sugar from the several varieties had suffered no diminution. In the manufacture of sugar, perhaps the most important process is that of defecation, and Dr. Collier appears to have made many experiments, using as reagents hydrate of lime, calcium sulphate and a mixture of these two.

The Lesson of the Informer's Death.

London Special: The shooting of Carey has produced a feeling of consternation in parliament. The informer's death is regarded as a severe blow to the policy of repression. Government by terrorism received a check, owing to the inability of authorities to protect their infamous agents. No one pretends to feel sorry for Carey's fate, but the English press is angry at the failure of the government to secure the informers safety: and it is considered that Carey's fate is likely to intimidate possible traitors. All over Ireland the news of Carey's death has been received with popular rejoicing, which add to the uneasy feeling of the legislators at Westminster.

For some time it has been known in St. Paul to a few that Mr. J. J. Hill, president of the Manitoba railway, contemplated the purchase of the White Bear township farm, of O. D. Gilfillan. It may be stated that the farm, which is more than 3,000 acres in extent and touches upon the township of Moundsview, was bought for $50,000, and will be made one of the most notable country seats in the west. Mr. Hill intends to remove most of his famous blooded stock from his Hennepin county farm to his new purchase, and before doing so to make many costly and noteworthy improvements. He has an admirable field of work in, since the farm includes "lakes, rills, ravines, and hillsides fine," with more than one eligible site for the manorial home to be erected. The owner is a great believer in and lover of Polled Angus cattle, and unless present intention changes, some of the most costly and long-pedigreed representatives of that highland stock will be domiciled at the Ramsey county country place.

Making Cross-Eyes Straight.

"The operation to be undergone by the patient is simple and practically painless. For the convergent cases there is no pain whatever, only a little annoyance while the operator is reaching the little muscle which has to be divided. I have performed the operation hundreds of times on other people, sometimes giving anesthetics, and often with no such pain. The patient is stretched on the table. I drew apart with my fingers the lids of his eyes and insert between them a little steel instrument shaped like the letter O. The sides of this expand by a spring and force the lids open, disclosing the eyeball and the network of muscles holding it in position and directing its movements. When this expansion is accomplished, I lift up the muscle with a small pair of tweezers, and divide it with my instrument. When it is cut it feels to the patient as if a small band of rubber was being snapped. There is no pain at all. Very often, however, painful operations are performed. The muscle has sometimes been divided too much, and the error has to be rectified. This requires some stitches to be taken, and a new cut to be made. The patient must be made unconscious while this is going on."

"Can you cure any case of strabismus?"

"I can benefit any ordinary case, even when it can't be entirely cured. I have been asked to operate upon the eyes of Ben Butler. I think I could give him as straight eyes as I have in half an hour's time."—[A Doctor, in New York Times.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

A circular letter has been addressed to all collectors of internal revenue by Collector Evans instructing them in several important details arising out of the recent consolidation of districts. In order to avoid the existence of two cigar or tobacco manufacturers of the same number in one district through the union of such under one head in the reorganization, collectors are directed to have such places as are liable to that objection renumbered. New bonds will not be required in cases where the existing ones are good and the manufacturing is to be carried on in the same building as before. As these are probably large stocks of cigar boxes on hand in the several districts which have been consolidated out of existence, it is suggested that these be allowed to be used with stamps and caution labels of the old districts until the stocks shall have been exhausted.

It was Secretary Folger's conscientious scruples that caused the president to change the hour of departure of last Sunday. The secretary saw the president and said that he had never traveled on the Sabbath unnecessarily, and that he would not, therefore, start with the party as arranged, but would follow on the next train. Without hesitation the president altered his plans in deference to Mr. Folger's wishes.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

The coroner's jury to investigate the Carlyon disaster on the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg road, brought in a verdict that the freight car on the side track was blown partly on the main track, and that it could not properly have been secured. The verdict censures the depot agent, William Barry, for not examining the car before leaving the depot the night of the accident, and states that every station on the road should be guarded by a watchman until the last train passed the road at night.

GENERAL NEWS GOSSIP.

The long-talked-of location of the great hotel—to secure the site for which St. Paul enterprise contributed $270,000 as a bonus for a $750,000 superstructure—has at last been determined, and there is now no obstacle in the way of immediate work upon the foundation. It is to be completed in two years, the site selected is the tract bounded by 250 feet on Seventh street on the north, 300 feet on Robert street on the west, and 150 feet on Sixth street on the south, or the magnificent total of 800 feet frontage on three of the best business streets in the city, and at a point midway between the state capitol, the postoffice and custom house district on the west, and the union depot and the wholesale district on the east; and the river and levee interests on the south, and the tend of business north toward the great terminal grounds of the Northern Pacific; in fact, the most central location that could possibly have been selected.

For dredging at Superior, Wis., $44,461 was available during the year, $21,135 of which was expended. The estimated amount to complete the project is $262,000, of which 110,000 can be used the next year.

The price is excess of £600,000 for each, and it is designed that the two vessels shall make a speed of nineteen knots per hour, or to cross the Atlantic in less than six days.

Tragedy in Far Off Alaska.

A Victoria, British Columbia dispatch of the 5th says: The steamer Eureka, arrived this morning from the north, brings news of a horrible tragedy at Dakaw, near Harrisburg, Alaska. Two whisky sellers, Rennie and Martin, got on a drunk and unceremoniously exchanged cabins. During the night Indians broke into Martin's cabin, where Rennie was sleeping, and stole a bottle of whisky. Soon the fact was discovered, and both of them started after the Indians, and in a fight which ensued Rennie was killed. Citizens in force arrested three Indians, confining them in a guard house. During the absence of the guard the Indians procured a pistol, shooting him on his return, and then fled. The firing awoke Maj. Givens, formerly of the United States army. He rushed to the rescue, and was shot down and wounded. The Indians took an ax and hacked his head to pieces. The three Indians then attempted to make good their escape, but a number of miners who had reached the scene shot one of them down, arrested a second, and the third escaped. The infuriated citizens constituted themselves a jury and hung the captured Indian. The next day Col. Barry ordered the chiefs to produce the third, who had escaped, who was quickly delivered up and promptly hanged.

Dishonest Army Officers.

Washington Special: There seems to be an epidemic in the army growing out of a desire on the part of certain young officers to add to their exchequer by duplicating their pay accounts. Two cases besides that of Col. Ilges have recently occurred which are attracting considerable attention on account of the standing of the parties. The first is that of Samuel C. Robertson, a son of the celebrated confederate cavalry commander, Gen. Beverly H. Roberson, and who was well known throughout the country. Army orders issued on the 1st, contained a detail for a court martial at Vancouver barracks to try young Robertson for duplicating his pay accounts. About five months ago Second Lieut. J. W. Pinder of the Eight cavalry resigned to take effect in six months. This proposition was acquiesced in by the war department and Pinder took advantage of the concession to act very dishonestly. Information has been received at the department stating that he has sold his accounts for the six months to half a dozen bankers located in various cities.

The Boston Journal says that F. T. & J. D. Phinney, boot and shoe counter manufacturers, have suspended, with liabilities something over $400,000. They are on Shaw & Bros'. paper to the amount of $400,000. The Journal's Bangor special says: The creditors of Shaw & Bros. are rapidly placing attachments on the property of that firm, in the hope that Maine creditors will be given preference over the creditors of other States; as regards the property of the firm in Maine. In this county the attachments aggregate $72,000. Other attachments upon the property of the firm in other parts of the state aggregate $100,000. There is considerable apprehension in regard to the St. Stephens, N. B., bank, though it is believed no suspension will be forced. The creditors of the firm in Calais, where the indebtedness is about $200,000, are pushing to secure the firm in every possible way.

Shot With Shoe Nails.

A horrible homicide was committed on the 3rd inst., in Doddridge county, near New Salem, West Va. John Cayton, agent for lands, rented a piece to Henry Rice. A difficulty occurred in reference to the payment of the rent, and at one time before Cayton and Rice exchanged shots. That evening both men met in a lonesome wood and the feud was renewed. Each was armed and indiscriminate shooting began. Rice was fatally shot by Cayton. The latter's gun was loaded with lath nails. Forty-five ugly, jagged wounds were counted in Rice's corpse. Great excitement prevails in the neighborhood where the shooting transpired.

Opening the White Earth Reservation.

The thirteen townships lying between White Earth and Red Lake reservations has been reopened for settlement. Parties are now hurrying into that section to stake out claims and build shanties, preparatory to filing on the same as soon as the land office is instructed to receive such filings. These townships are said to be among the very best in the state for agricultural purposes, and will no doubt soon be producing large quantities of the best grades of wheat. The land is from sixty to seventy-five miles from any railroad point, but it is expected that the Duluth & Winnipeg, or the Brainerd & Grand Forks roads will obviate this difficulty in the near future. Filings will be received for the lands therein at the United States land office in Crookston.

Training the Mechanical Instincts.

Francis A. Walker says excessive training in letters weakens the executive faculty. One side of the mind cannot be trained without injury to the rest. The imagination, the memory, the tastes, the rhetorical faculties, cannot be developed exclusively without weakening the judgment and the will. Herein lies the explanation of the contempt of shrewd, uneducated men for the book men. Civil engineers are rarely good mechanics, and most frequently do not understand the methods of using their material in the most economical way. They may have been well trained in the mathematics and theories of their professions, but they have never actually worked on wood or iron, and acquired a practical acquaintance with their qualities and their possibilities. Therefore, they are timid sometimes in the presence of what are really small difficulties. They hesitate and are lost. Ask a newly graduated civil engineer to tunnel the Thames or bridge the East river, and he would unhesitatingly make his plans and his estimate; but put him before a paltry brook tumbling across a country road, and, after he has hesitated and trembled, he will make a structure elaborate and strong enough for a great river, whereas any ordinary country surveyor would have thrown over a good enough bridge in half the time and at a good deal less cost of money and material. Now, continued General Walker, suppose that civil engineer had had his mechanical instincts trained from the first, as lawyers and clergymen are trained in letters. He would have never made a mountain of his mole-hill.

LATE MARKET REPORT.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Business has been very dull for the week, but holders have been steady in their asking figures that have shown no changes. Quotations: Patents, Orange Blossom, $6.50@6.75; Red Cross, straights, $5.75; Capitol family, $5@5.25; Bakers', XXXX, $4; in barrels, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality; low grades, $2@2.50. Rye flour, $4@4.25 per bbl. Graham, $5@5.25 per bbl.

WHEAT—There has been and is a fair inquiry for hard wheats, the spot prices of which have gradually increased, showing slight advance for the week. Receipts have been limited and movements generally have been light, thus helping to sustain values in the presence of improved crop reports. Prices have been regulated mainly by the real merits of the market, irrespective of outside influences. The market on Tuesday was rather quiet, closing at the following: No. 1 hard, $1.11; August, $1.08; September, $1.05; October and year, $1.04; No. 1 spot, $1.08; No. 2 hard, $1.08; No. 2, 98c; No. 3, 95c; No. 4, 87c; all bids.

CORN—The market has been dull, the demand having fallen off since a week ago. Receipts have been moderate. Buyers and sellers have been wide apart, and sales have consequently dragged. Closing figures: No. 2, 44c bid, 48c asked for spot and August; year, 44c bid, 47c asked; No. 3, 40c bid, 41@42c asked; rejected, 40c asked.

OATS—The demand for consumption has been fairly active, but the feeling is weaker, prices closing lower after a slight advance during the week, and settling down to the values of a week ago. Stocks on hand are fair. During a part of the week there was considerable activity. On Tuesday morning reports from Chicago of lower quotations for year oats made buyers weak here. The market closed with fair demand at easy figures. No. 2 mixed, 32c bid, 33c asked; August, 32@33½c asked; September, 28½@29c bid, 30c asked; October, 28c bid, 29c asked; year, 27c bid, 29c asked; No. 3 mixed, 30c bid, 32c asked; No. 2 white, 34c bid, 35c asked; No. 3 white, 33c asked; rejected, 28c bid. Tuesday's sales: 1 car No. 2 white, 35c f.o.b.; 2 cars No. 2 mixed, 34c; 2 cars do do, 33c; 1 car No. 2 white, 34c; 1 car No. 2 mixed, 39c sacked.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—Nothing has occurred during the week to break the dull monotony of the market. Minnesota patents are quoted in New York at $5.60@7.25, and in Chicago at $5.30@6.00. Local quotations are: Patents, $6.75; straights, $5.40@5.55; clears, $4.65@5.10; low grades, $1.85@3.

MILLSTUFF—Has been firm, with an upward tendency, but an early break in prices is predicted. Quotations: Bran in bulk, $6.75@7; sacked, $8.50@9. Fine shorts, $9.50@10; coarse, $9@9.25. Mixed feed, $17@20.50, according to quality. Coarse corn meal, $20.

WHEAT—The chief events of yesterday were an advance of 1c on No. 1 hard and on No. 2 hard, with no offerings, and an advance of 3c all around by the Millers' association. On 'change $1.12 was freely bid for No. 1 hard, and $1.08 for No. 2 hard. The only sales were of No. 2 northern, at $1.02. Quotations: No. 1 hard, spot, $1.12; seller the year, $1.01½; seller December, $1.04; seller February, $1.08; No. 2 hard, $1.08; No. 1 Northern, $1.06; No. 2 Northern, $1.02; No. 1, $1.03; No. 2, 99c; No. 3, 95c; Millers' association prices: No. 1 hard, $1.10; No. 2 hard, $1.05; No. 1 regular, $1.03; No. 2, $1; No. 3, 90c; No. 4, 80c.

CORN—Has been very dull all the week, quotable at 47c for No. 2 spot; condemned, 41@46c, by sample.

OATS—Have been in the same condition as corn during the week. The highest bid Tuesday was 25c for No. 2 mixed. Quotable nominally at 31c for No. 2 mixed; white, 33c; rejected, 28@30c, by sample.

CHICAGO MARKET—Flour unchanged. Wheat is in fair demand and closed easier at $1.01@1.01¼ July; $1.01¼@1.01⅜ August; $1.03½@1.03⅝ September; $1.05½@1.05¾ October; $1.06¾@1.06½ November; $1 the year; No. 2 spring, $1; No. 3 spring, 87c; No. 2 red winter, 86c. On the Iroquois branch of [illegible] Central rails are now laid for a distance of seven miles south from Iroquois, and on the southerly end thirty-five miles of track are laid from Hawarden, leaving only twenty-eight miles of iron to complete the connection from Iroquois to Chicago via the Dover route.

Honor to whom Honor is due.

The Chronicle perpetrated a bit of a joke last Friday, claiming to be the first to call attention to the thirteen townships by giving it a write up, thus being entitled to the credit of their being so soon thrown upon the market. That must have been a huge goak for those lands, withdrawn on the 19th day of March 1879 had begun to attract the attention of settlers as early as the summer and fall of 1878 many going in and taking claims that summer. Several went from Crookston, who gave up their claims in the spring as soon as the order was promulgated but many remained and have now the finest claims in Polk County. Now we don't claim the honor of having discovered America simply because the files of the JOURNAL contain some glowing accounts of that fine country, comprised within the borders of that thirteen township tract, written and published in the fall of 1878 and summer and fall of 1879 (before the Chronicle was born). When the land was withdrawn we published an article denunciatory of the act and we have done our level best ever since to hasten the day when those lands should be thrown into the market but we don't suppose that brought about the result as the Secretary of the Interior and the President both quit taking the JOURNAL at about that time and wrote us that they were getting so many papers that they could not find time to read them all and would have to drop on many of them. They paid up several years arrearages and quit, so we suppose they have not read the JOURNAL lately, but we had not given up all hopes of acquiring that territory yet for we know that the value of those lands was pretty well known that many were squatting upon those lands whose influence in time would be felt, and we also knew that there was one very influential man at work upon that question for the JOURNAL has often printed petitions for him which he circulated and sent in to the authorities at Washington. When the Hon. Knute Nelson, then a candidate for Congress, paid our city a visit last summer among other things we asked him what he would do for us on the thirteen townships business? His reply was that in case of his election those townships would be thrown upon the market at an early day. Last winter Mr. Paul C. Sletten caused a large number of petitions to be printed, circulated and signed and these Mr. Nelson took to Washington early in the spring and on the 13th day of July the President made the order which placed the lands upon the market. While the JOURNAL kept constantly calling the attention of people to these lands while they were out of the market we suppose they would have been opened just as quick if we had never said a word about them; but if Paul Sletten had not done the work he did, and put in the money necessary to procure the result, aided by the efforts of the Hon. Knute Nelson we have reason to suppose that this county would have waited years before those lands were thrown upon the market. Therefore we say "Honor to whom honor is due."

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 28, 1883.

Register and Receiver, Crookston, Minn.

GENTLEMEN: I transmit herewith a copy of Executive Order, dated July 13, 1883, cancelling Executive Order of March 18, 1879, and restoring to settlement and disposal the lands therein referred to.

A copy of the order last mentioned is attached hereto for your information.

Make the necessary annotations upon your records and acknowledge the receipt of this letter.

Very Respectfully,
N. O. MCFARLAND,
Commissioner.

CROOKSTON, Aug. 4th, 1883.

ED. JOURNAL: The foregoing letter from the commissioner of the General Land Office, first published in the JOURNAL extra of Friday, is causing an excitement in our community reminding us, who are old enough to remember, of the '49 California, and the later Pikes Peake gold craze. Everybody is asking everybody else "which is the best road to reach the thirteen townships," and all sorts of vehicles are in demand for transportation. Who is to blame for this great commotion? It is well known that the original order withdrawing the lands in question, for Indian purposes, made four years ago last March at the instigation of the Indian Bureau, gave great dissatisfaction to our people, who had just had their attention directed to the advantages of these lands, and some of whom had already made and filed their claims thereon. From the first the Receiver, Mr. P. C. Sletten, took an active part in efforts to have the executive order rescinded. When others did not even hope for such a consummation he never failed to labor for it, repeatedly representing the facts and the wishes of the people to any and every person having or supposed to have such influence with the Interior Department as might secure the end in view. An extensive correspondence with Senators and Representatives in Congress and with other prominent men whose aid might secure the hoped for result was kept up to a great extent during the four years just past. More than any other individual, certainly, Mr. Sletten must be entitled to the credit of success in the efforts made for the cancellation of the order of withdrawal.

"Once in a while even a modest man may claim credit for starting a scheme which results grandly," and those who know the matter from the beginning to the end will give those newspapers and their editors, who deserve it, credit for helping Mr. Sletten in his good work. The attention of the people was directed to these lands before any newspaper of Polk, or any other county directed it, and the agitation was made and kept alive as much by individual efforts probably as by newspaper paragraphs, which were after all only an echo of the public voice.

Since the election of Mr. K. Nelson to Congress, he has given Mr. Sletten his active aid in the efforts to secure the re-opening of these lands to settlement and also in securing the rights of the settlers upon the odd numbered sections, so long unjustly withheld from them, and both of these matters have resulted grandly.

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE."

The Detroit Record got a dose last fall which, like some milder doses it had taken before, disagreed with its stomach, and when the bile comes up, as it did a few days since, it always tries to make folks think the unpleasant odor comes from somebody else, but as the people know what's the matter with the Record, it can't do any harm. The same sickness is what ails all the other papers who are abusing Mr. Sletten and our member of congress.

"As good and effective an answer as we can find to all slanderous articles that not only the Record but every other Kindred payer in the District have promulgated against Mr. Sletten is found in the Executive order which we publish in full to-day. Mr. Sletten, for the last four years, has labored faithfully for the opening of the withdrawn lands, and, while his political enemies have made the air blue with their curses against him, he has quietly and effectually worked. The Record and other Kindred sheets howled "corruption" and published slanderous reports against Sletten, and the Hon. Knute Nelson, while both have been accomplishing two of the grandest things that ever happened for this country, that is the opening to settlement of those lands and the obtaining for settlers upon odd sections their rights, both of which have been accomplished by the faithful efforts of Mr. Sletten aided by the Hon. Knute Nelson. Thus, in a manner that redounds to the best interests of this county, and in a manner highly creditable to Mr. Sletten and Mr. Nelson are these gentlemen "answering the slanderous reports of their political enemies. "By their FRUITS ye shall know them!"

Respectfully, POSTED.

CROOKSTON, Aug. 8th, 1883.

ED. JOURNAL.

DEAR SIR: I see there is an evident disposition on the part of my friends to give me too much credit in the matter of the thirteen townships, recently thrown upon the market. While this is all very flattering to know that one's friends do not forget one, yet I think, in that the principal actor in the matter is almost entirely over-looked. During the last campaign the opponents of the Hon. Knute Nelson used thousands of dollars to defeat him and filled their newspapers with paid campaign lies among which it was conspicuously stated that "Knute Nelson is the paid attorney of the railroad and, if elected will work solely and simply in the railroad interests." I wish to call attention to the manner in which these predictions were fulfilled. In the Counties of Polk and Norman there were settlers who had taken claims on odd or railroad sections. The Kindred papers said the settlers must lose those if Nelson was elected. Notwithstanding those reports and thousands of dollars spent to defeat him Nelson was elected and what do we see? Almost the first thing that happened, the land office received orders from Washington to accept proofs in the case of Hans Bangen, who settled upon a railroad quarter in 1874, Peder Thompson, in 1872, Lars B. Larson, in 1871 and many others who settled upon their claims during those years. Nelson was elected and his first act was to protect those poor settlers in their rights who had not the money to fight for their own rights. The next thing is the opening of the withdrawn lands whereby hundreds of poor men have acquired a good farm and a small fortune, and, as though the Hon. Knute Nelson had not already done enough for his poor constituents, right on the heels of this grand scheme comes an order from the department at Washington to the Land Office at Crookston to take testimony in the cases of Joseph Beaudette, Alexander Beaudette and Albert Beaudette, who settled upon railroad indemnity lands, in Gentilly in 1877 and whose filings, when offered were rejected because they conflicted with the railroad company's rights, and forward said testimony to Washington for action by the Department. All this the Hon. Knute Nelson has accomplished before he ever took his seat, thus proving the web of campaign lies promulgated against him by the Kindred papers false and proving himself worthy of the entire confidence of the settlers who voted for him. Therefore, Mr. Editor I say most emphatically, to Mr. Nelson is chiefly due the honor in all these cases. While it is true that I have done what little I could in these cases it is also true that I could have done nothing without the efficient aid of Mr. Nelson who went to Washington and labored hard in the interest of the settlers to accomplish the grand results which you now see.

PAUL C. SLETTEN.

County News.

St. Hilaire Packet.

From the Spectator

The enterprising POLK COUNTY JOURNAL published an extra on Friday last, anouncing the opening of the thirteen townships to settlement. The Chronicle also published the executive order the same day, while the Daily Northern Tier did not hear the news until the next day, when a friend kindly whispered it in the editor's copious ear. He had probably been snoring softly in his office chair, and dreaming he was publishing "the most popular paper in the county," while his rivals were around taking note of what was going on.

A copy of the executive order cancelling the order of March 18, 1879, and restoring to settlement the land contained in the thirteen townships and joining the White Earth Indian Reservation was received at the U. S. Land Office, Crookston, on Friday last. The Chronicle and JOURNAL both published the order and Crookston has been full of people ever since who are flocking into the Land Office to file on the land. Hon. Paul Sletten, of Crookston, has worked hard to have these lands opened to settlement and deserves much credit for the successful manner in which he has carried the thing through.

East Grand Forks.

J. C. Bennett, superintendent of the Manitoba ditch, now being cut some nine miles from here, was in town to day, and reports the work progressing rapidly, some 70 men and 20 teams being used on his New Era Graders, which are doing fine work. Mr. Bennett expects to have the ditch completed about October 1st. This ditch is being dug by the St. Paul, M. & M. R. R. Co., and is to pass through towns 151, 152, 153, and 154, range 49, and will drain an area of about thirty miles of otherwise useless lands, extending some eighteen to twenty miles in length, and from eighteen to thirty miles wide, and from two to six feet in depth, with a good fall from one to two and one-half feet per mile, and emptying into the Red Lake river, which stream would, we think, be a sufficient outlet for this vast body of water if it were properly cleaned out, and we have every reason to believe that the railroad company will soon dredge the river.—[Grand Forks Herald.

A group of Red Lake Falls Indians are in town, among them a chief.

Quite a number of Polk county farmers have been interviewed regarding the crop outlook and their verdict is the same—as good, if not better than last season, especially where the grain was properly put in.

Mr. Freemire, the popular elevator man, who has had a vacation of a month visiting a friend in Minneapolis, has returned, and is ready to handle the thousands of bushels of No. 1 hard that will soon be coming to this place.

David Sulzback Saturday manufactured his first cigars at this place. They were sampled by some of our professional smokers and pronounced first-class. Mr. Sulzbach is going to employ quite a number of efficient workmen and will manufacture on an extensive scale.

There is some prospect of having a high school in East Grand Froks. By a little energy and enterprise on the part of the school board, something like $400 a year can be derived from the state. Gentlemen of the board, this matter should receive your warmest sympathy and co-operation.

Does Farming Pay?

The Providence Democrat, in answering this question, tells of a young farmer in that state who thought it did not pay, and therefore went to the city to look for a situation where he could make more money. He consulted an acquaintance who had a good position in the city and they compared notes. The farmer had supported his family on a hired farm, fed and clothed them well, but had only put by $50 during the year. The clerk, whose family was not as large, had lived very prudently upon a salary of $3 per day and had accumulated a debt of $75 in the same length of time. Nearly every dollar of his pay could be accounted for in house rent, car fare, food, fuel and necessary clothing, and the debt was caused by a purchase of needed furniture. It is unnecessary to state that the farmer returned to the farm with a different idea of the profits and of farming.

Cheap Hired Men.

There is a difference in hired men, as in other persons and things, and while most farmers have hired help about them several months in a year, they generally pay but little attention to the character of the men they hire beyond the one matter of their ability to work. There are two features of the hired help question we wish to emphasize.

First, is cheap help cheap? And by cheapness we mean comparatively low wages. As a general rule such help is the most expensive in the end. There may be exceptions to this, but few farmers, even thought hearty and strong and always able to be about with their help and lead in the work, can afford to leave nothing to the judgement, honesty and general fidelity of their help. Such a farmer cannot always see that his cheap help keeps at work, that it does what he wants done, and does it in the right way.

Another exception is where the farmer can get, as he can perhaps occasionally, a foreigner, burly, strong, honest and anxious to learn, and who is as faithful as the most dutiful son could be. Such a man demands only moderate wages, and he earns them because he is faithful, wants to learn the ways of the Americans, and seems never to grow weary. Away back in the "forties" there came to the farm and home of our childhood such a man from famine-stricken Ireland. He was the very embodiment of physical strength and fidelity, and he demanded but moderate wages, for he wanted to learn. Faithful "Mike" was the only cheap hired man of nearly a score of years who did not cost all he was worth and generally a little more. But the general run of cheap hired men are a pest and a nuisance. A few years ago we hired a man—a man who knew how to do things, who was faithful, kind and careful in his management of the stock and a dairy of five-and-twenty cows. We knew our man and hired him, paid him his price, and he did not disappoint us. He never put the team into the barn unfed, never abused it, never pounded the cows with his milking-stool and broke farming tools. Some of our neighbors protested that we paid too much—they could hire "young fellers" for twenty-five per cent less than we paid, and did it. They were men who cared for nothing but their wages, and shirked when out of sight, abused the horses, made free use of their milkingstools in disciplining the cows, and the model one of those "cheap" men ruined a fifteen-dollar plow for his employer the first month of his service. Now, on a two-hundred acre farm, with a dairy of twenty-five or thirty cows, teams, etc., it don't require a great deal of neglect, shirking and milking-stool code of farmyard discipline to beat the farmer out of forty dollars, the extra cost of our hired man that year. We harvested fifty bushels of oats to the acre; the dairy yield was above the average; our calves were the best in the neighborhood; no team looked better or did more work; the damage to farming tools did not exceed two dollars, while the repairs made rainy days would have cost, if done off the farm, more than his extra wages. Our man was a gentleman always about the house; used no obscene or profane language, never went about with a lighted pipe or cigar in his mouth, to drop hot cinders on the chips or hay, and he never went off nights for a spree. We don't know that he had any disposition to do these things; we think he did, but distinctly understood that no man with such habits could work for us. We never did and never will have such immoral, dissipated, reckless help about ous; it dont pay, financially or otherwise. The person who wants good, industrious, faithful, reliable, moral help, can get it, and we are fully persuaded that in the end it is the cheapest and best.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, THURSDAY, AUGUST 16, 1883. NO. 16

The Detroit Record is mad because Paul Sletten went into Becker county and secured the appointment of Mr. Torgerson as Deputy Treasurer, thereby getting away with the ring, of which the Record man is a member. Sletten will not mourn, to any great extent, the loss of what little friendly feeling existed between himself and that click. Paul is generally around, and as yet has not failed to accomplish his end.—[Norman County Banner.

A Gentleman who has taken an active part in Minnesota politics, but who is unbiased, has recently returned from a visit to most of the towns of the Fifth district, and states to the Journal that the vote for Gilman will not fall so far below that for the balance of the republican state ticket as many down this way anticipate. He says that a majority of the friends of Kindred are not disposed to carry the congressional fight into the state canvass, but inclined rather to await an opportunity to settle old scores in future congressional canvasses. Mr. Gilman's vote will doubtless be somewhat short in nearly all sections of the state, but not sufficiently so to endanger his success. On the theory that a miss is as good as a mile, Mr. Gilman will care very little for the fact that he comes in a trifle behind other candidates on the state ticket.—[Minneapolis Evening Journal.

A Salutary Lesson.

The Red River valley, noted the world over for its fertility and for its exceptional exemption from the vicissitudes that embarrass farming operations in other regions, has barely escaped a serious calamity in the shape of drouth. A practical farmer from the stony hills of the east looking over our prairies in the spring, with their superabundance of moisture, and examining the friable surface soil, underlaid by a clay subsoil that holds water like a barrel, would wonder how it were possible, with proper cultivation, that such land could fail even in the dryest season, to produce at least a reasonable yield of grain. That it has barely escaped failing to do so this season is a fact too apparent to doubt, and a truth that our farmers should be ashamed to acknowledge.

There is an axiom, that "where providence does most for man he does least for himself," illustrations of the truth of which are abundant all over this country, and the Red River valley furnishes its quota. In many cases with first settlers, superficial cultivation is almost a necessity, but unfortunately, after the necessity, has disappeared, it becomes a habit, and slovenly farming, with its consequent short crops, is the result. And had there been a failure of an average crop in the Red River Valley this season, indefficient cultivation would have solely to blame for it. The writer of this article has given close attention to crop reports during the present season, and the result of his observations is that where land has been properly drained so as to relieve it of the surface water early in the spring, plowed to the depth of six or seven inches, and carefully seeded, there would have been an average crop without a drop of rainfall from the 1st of of July until harvest.

In the cultivation of wheat, and that the best produced in the world, the the north Dakota farmer is almost absolutely independent of climate or meteorological influences. The melting of the snow of winter and the spring rains furnish an abundance of moisture, which is retained in the soil; the timely drainage of surplus water in the spring, and the cultivation of the soil to a fine tilth of sufficient depth to give the roots of the plant room for growth will insure a good crop in any season. It is hoped that the scare they have had this year will prove a salutary lesson for our farmers, and that they will by better cultivation provide against such a disgraceful calamity in the future as a failure of the crops in North.—[Grand Forks News.

Breeding Seed Grain.

Farmers Review.

The term "breeding" as applied to grain will be regarded as misapplied. But it more clearly represents the idea in the mind of the writer than any other that could be chosen. Stock-breeding has for years engaged the attention of scientific and practical men in this country and Europe, and the results are seen in the improved breeds of horses, cattle, sheep, swine and poultry throughout the country, while their influence in grading up the common stock is seen on almost every farm and ranch. The gardeners, nurserymen, seedsmen and florists have brought about great improvement in vegetables, fruits and flowers, improving old varieties, and developing new and valuable ones. But no such careful, painstaking, scientific effort has been directed to the improvement of the seeds of grain which form the staple of the farmers' crops. If improved varieties have been introduced they have largely been the result of accidental hybridizing or have been brought from distant localities, and under new conditions have for a time proved superior to varieties previously grown. There has been no careful breeding for improved varieties previously grown. There has been no careful breeding for improved varieties or improvement in quality, as has been the case with the live stock men, the gardeners, nurserymen, and florists. It is, perhaps, incorrect to say there has been no effort in this direction. What is meant is that it has not by any means been general, or to any such extent as to make itself felt in the agriculture of the country. It has in no case passed beyond the stage of experiment in the hands of few individuals, yet such experiments indicate, if indeed they do not demonstrate, that by a careful system of "seed-breeding" as great an improvement can be made upon the grain crops of the country as we already see has been wrought in the live stock interests, the improved quality of which is not only a source of greater profit to the individual farmer, but adds immensely to the value of our resources as a nation. The average yield per acre of wheat and corn in this country for the past ten years has been (omitting fractions), twelve bushels for wheat and twenty-seven for corn. If by improving the quality of the seed of these two crops the yield, without improved culture, could be increased 50 per cent, it would add to the annual income of the farmers of this country on the basis of last year's yield, at $1 per bushel for wheat and 50c for corn, no less a sum than 670,000,000 of dollars, equal to over $13 per capita of our entire population, and yet it is morally as certain that by pursuing as careful a system of seed breeding as has been pursued in stock breeding, such an improvement could be wrought out, as it is that a thorough-bred or grade short-horn or Hereford steer is worth more and pays a larger profit than the native scrub. The same principle of breeding is applicable in both cases. Selection of the best and breeding or propagating from that taking care that the stock is not allowed to deteriorate. In live stock the selection is not difficult. In grain, how to select the best is a more difficult problem. But it is being thought out by clever and enthusiastic experimenters. The pioneer in this movement, so far as is known to the writer, is Major Hallett, F. L. S., of Brighton, England, who commenced his experiments in 1861, and has since continued them, an interesting account of which appeared in the July number of the Popular Science Monthly. He finds that in the cereals no two grains or kernels are exactly alike in productive power. That in every head of wheat or other grain there is one kernel, which greatly excels all the others in vital power, and which will transmit to a greater or less extent its character to all the grains produced from it. Of eighty-seven grains of wheat from two heads planted by him under precisely the same conditions, and in the same plat, one produced ten heads containing 688 kernels. No other grain produced anything near this, and the finest ten heads selected from the plot only gave 598 kernels, or ninety kernels less than the product of this one kernel. The next year he planted the grain from the largest head of the plant which produced ten ears, planting in a row singly, twelve inches apart. One of the kernels produced a plant which produced fifty-two ears, while the plants on either side of it in the row produced seventeen and twenty-nine ears respectively, and the finest of all the other plants produced forty ears. The same system of selection was pursued each year, the results being that the length of the year was doubled, its contents trebled, and the tillering or stooling-out capacity increased five times. The general principles wrought out, or the law of vegetation discovered by these experiments, is summarized as follows:

1. Every fully-developed plant, whether of wheat, oats or barley, presents an ear superior in productive power to any of the rest on that plant. 2. Every such plant contains one grain which upon trial, proves more productive than any other. 3. The best grain in a given plant is found in the best ear. 4. The superior vigor of this grain is transmissable in different degrees to its progeny. 5. By repeated careful selections the superiority is accumulated. 6. The improvement, which is at first rapid, gradually, after a long series of years, is diminished in amount, and is eventually so far arrested that practically a limit to improvement in the desired quality is reached. 7. By still continuing to select, the improvement is maintained, and practically a fixed type is the result.

The practical value which these experiments and results have for the farmer is in this, that when a superior variety has by a long course of experiment been developed, and its character fixed, its multiplication for purposes of seeding is so rapid that in a few years it can become widely disseminated among the farmers. The variety of wheat known as the "wild goose' wheat, it is claimed, was all propagated from a single grain taken from the craw of a wild goose. The origin of an Egyptian mummy. The development of improved varieties of corn is now claiming the attention of those in charge of our agricultural experiment stations and private investigators. Some important facts have already been developed, and important results may be looked for in the improvement of his crop. The farmer can easily pursue a course of experiment for the improvement of his seed corn. This requires a special patch, not necessarily large, to be devoted to this purpose. It should be at such distance from any other corn that by no possibility could the ears be fertilized by the pollen from any other field. As soon as in tassel, every barren stalk should be cut out, so that the fertilization will only be by fruitful plants. Selecting the best ears for seed, the same course could be pursued the next year, resulting unquestionably in a seed that would be vastly more prolific than the original seed. An interesting experiment would be to select for planting the experimental patch, ears from stalks bearing two perfect ears, and remove not only the barren stalks, but the tassels of all on which two ears had not set, ensuring that the entire fertilization should be from stalks bearing two ears. The probable result of a few years of this practice would be to so fix the character of the seed that each stalk would produce two or more perfect ears.

AN EARLY FROST

There is every indication that the Northwest will be visited this fall by an early frost. We do not think there is any danger that the crops will suffer to any extent by such a visitation, but we have noticed that when we have such extremes in the weather as we have had this spring and summer we were always visited by an early frost. We believe the corn and sugar cane crop will be out of the reach of the cold weather by the 1st of September. It looks now as if we should have a corn crop, and from what we have learned outside of the city the same may be said regard to the cane crop. It is fortunate for our farmers that as a general rule the Northwest is not a frosty country, but, on the other hand, free from it, especially from May to September.

IMPROVEMENT OF SOILS.

Draining and manuring are the principal means employed for improving the soil. Almost all agriculturists —certainly all inquiring and well informed ones—are now pretty well acquainted with the advantages to be derived from the above named methods of improvement, and are thoroughly convinced that all judicious expenditures, either in the way of draining or of manuring, will be made to pay. The agricultural community do not need great additions to their knowledge on these points. But there is a method of improving soils, to which the attentions of farmers has not been, as yet, much directed. We mean the farmers occupying prairie farms, and refer to sub-soiling. Some little has been done in this way, but very little attempted, principally, we presume, from the generally prevailing opinion that labor expended in this manner will not pay. There is not a shadow of a doubt that if Mr. Dalrymple the big farmer of the Red River Valley, and others all through the Northwest would permit the plowshare to turn up two or three inches of the virgin soil they would be greatly benefited by the result.

Seely's new sign flutters in the breezes, pointing to refreshments of various kinds.

Work on Dobson's new Broadway brick block has been commenced and is proceeding briskly.

El. Strader and Billy Clary went after chickens on Wednesday and shot 18 in an hour's time—they say.

Geo. Warninger has bought the Schrader mare and now boasts as fine a driving animal as the city affords.

Herb Mason has gone to St. Paul. On his return look out for lots of new goods, confectionery, fruits etc., etc.

I. M. Underhill is entertaining his mother and sister who came to see how he enjoys life in the New Northwest.

City Clerk Hurlbut rejoices in the arrival of a son and heir, which event transpired last Thursday. Hurlbut stands two feet in his stockings—higher.

The Albion house is about to be moved to the lot west of its present site and a new brick block erected upon its present site before snow flies.

The Captain says we "reflect unkindly" upon him. The Captain's image reflects much more unkindly upon himself than we or any other man could possibly do.

H. L. Roberts, a big farmer of Fisher, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday. He says his grain beats all of his experience in this country and thinks he will have a larger yield than last year.

Sam Rosenthal, of the C. O. D. clothing store has just returned with a large stock of Gent's Furnishing Goods to which he invites attention of all who are in need of a nobby suit at bottom prices.

Mr. J. H. Van Dyke and Chet. Van Dyke were in the city last week to visit their brother Dr. M. Van Dyke. They pronounce the city to be the boss of any city in the Northwest except Alexandria.

Dan McKinnon has received a large invoice of the finest cigars it has been our pleasure to sample for some time. If you enjoy a good cigar after a good square meal go to Dan's restaurant for both.

Rev. C. F. Tolman of Chicago, district secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, will preach for the Baptists here next Sabbath Aug. 19th. Services Carman 10:30 a. m., Crookston 7:45 p. m.

Pete Misgen says Capt. Arnold is always ready to crack a joke upon everybody but Capt. He says the Capt. is wonderfully quiet upon the joke the tramp got off upon him (the Captain) on the nose business.

Hugh Robertson starts for New York city next week. He says the withdrawn lands are all very good but thinks he will have a claim in New York, fresh from the old country, worth dozens of claims in the thirteen townships.

Capt. Arnold flatters himself and makes his boasts that he has precipitated a "newspaper war" in Polk County. That's where he makes another mistake. Fortunately our newspapers are all too respectable to engage in a war against him.

Next Tuesday evening T. DeWitt Talmage will deliver his great lecture on "Big Blunders" at Ericsson's Hall. It is thought that one of the big blunders he refers to is Beecher's theory of Evolution, and if so, no one should fail to hear him.

McKinnon Bros. are still in the market with twine. They have already sold over $5,000 worth and yet there is more and to spare. Our grain prospects have increased so much that farmers are buying largely when a short time since they thought they would need but very little.

Mr. Finan McDonald, of Ada, was brought to this city on Monday by Dr. Fred Koyle, to consult Dr. Dampier on his case. He is now at the residence of his son Dan McDonald, our city marshal. We are told that on Wednesday Dr. Dampier was very hopeful of the case. We trust that the old gentleman will soon recover his wonted health.

On Friday last the Tier gave (as a news item—not in its "advertising columns" or its "weakly,") the following announcement: "Hon. Knute Nelson, member of Congress from this District, passed north to Warren, this morning!" There's enterprise for you. Knute Nelson was registered at one of the St. Paul hotels on that day, so there must be two of him, or else the Tier is a liar. "Enterprise," we suppose the Tier would call it! That's the kind of "enterprise" the Tier is.

Try Dan McKinnon's cigars.

If you want an elegant room call and see Charlie Seely.

Charlie Davis has a fine lot of fruits of all kinds. Call and sample.

Several nicely furnished rooms to let. Apply to Charlie Seely, Second Street.

Drop in and see how nice and cosy Charlie Seely has every thing arranged.

Hon. A. C. Hickman, of Owatonna made us a pleasant call on Wednesday.

Talmage on Tuesday evening next Don't commit a big blunder by being absent.

Judge J. W. Slee, of Warren, is in the city attending to business at the U. S. Land Office.

The young folks dance at Ericsson's Hall last evening was well attended and was an enjoyable time.

Some mean skunk poisoned Charlie Davis' little dog, Daisy, last night. Charlie would like to get his claws on the fellow who did it.

Miss. Alice Van Dyke is in the city for a visit for a week with her brother Doctor M. Van Dyke. She expects to return to Alexandria next week.

A. N. Jenson, county coroner of Marshall county, is in the city looking for a better country, He is well pleased and may decide to locate here.

H. Tharaldson, formerly one of the County Commissioners was in the city on Wednesday on his return from the thirteen townships. He says its boss.

Rev. T. J. West returned last week from a visit to Racine, Chicago, Quincy and Rock Island. He says of all the places he has seen there is no place like home.

The loss on Peter Cornelius' hay, that was a few weeks since destroyed by lightning, has been adjusted by the Hekla Insurance Co., in which company Pete was wise enough to be fully insured.

Mr. P. Peterson, of the Chicago New Era, gave us a pleasant call to-day. He is writing up the New Northwest in the interest of his paper and if his expressions of admiration go for any thing he will give a glowing report of us.

We have not been out after chickens yet but lots of good hunters have and report fine sport. Wednesday opened the sport where a white man had (for the first time this year) rights that all prairie chickens are bound to respect.

On Monday our handsome Deputy Sheriff, A. N. Hopkins, took six or eight ladies out to the residence of Mr. J. P. Marcum, to eat raspberries and cream. Oh golly! don't we wish we had been a deputy Sheriff or one of the other women! yum! yum!!

On the 13th inst. a judgment in favor of Andrew Sture vs the Red River & Lake of the Woods Railroad Co., was entered and an execution has been placed in the hands of Dept. Sheriff Hopkins who will sell four or five miles of the track or collect the money.

Next week wheat harvesting will be inaugurated and by the latter part the hum of the reaper in the golden wheat will be general. Our observations, which have been carefully made, warrant us in predicting for Polk County an average yield of fifteen bushels per acre.

The Detroit Record of last week publishes a lot of stuff, which if the influence of the Record amounted to a row of buttons would be calculated to injure the reputation of Paul C. Sletten. The Record also gives us a little attention to which all in due time we shall notice as it deserves.

The fourth quarterly meeting for this conference year, of the Methodist Episcopal church, will be held in the Methodist church, in this city next Saturday and Sunday. The quarterly conference will meet on Saturday at 8:00 p. m. for the transaction of business, fellowship meeting at 10:30 a. m. and public service at 11:00 a. m., on Sunday. Rev. G. R. Hair of Fargo the Presiding Elder of the Red River District will preside.

The Tier assumes that "our County Fair" has fallen through because he has "not heard anything about it lately!" Well, Capt., the many items of genuine news you "don't hear anything about" would make a mitey interesting paper, and the few you do get don't amount to much, but we would say for your information that "our" County Fair this fall is all right and is going to be an immense success.

Capt. Arnold quotes a land office notice and another ad to prove that he mentioned the opening of the thirteen townships before the JOURNAL did. Those ad's were put in Cap's paper before the lands were opened and they do not announce the fact. The order was received at this Land Office on August 3d and was published in the Chronicle and JOURNAL, but never in the Tear. The Capt. was badly left on that point and he knows it.

Editor Talbot of the Railway Age is interviewing the New Northwest accompanied by assistant editor Herbert. The gentlemen travel in a special car which was designed as a present for Mr. Talbot and given him by the railroad companies. They are accompanied by their ladies and are out on a two months trip. In conversation with Mr. Talbot that gentleman informed us that he has been very favorably impressed with what he has seen of this New Northwest and it is his belief that we have a grander future before us than many in the east suspect. The party will go north as far as Winnipeg, out on the C. P. as far as it extends and then, returning go over the N. P. R. R., to the sea coast on the west.

The next time you write up a "machine trial," Johnnie, you had better soak your head.

Friend Utzinger is fixing up his store building on Second Street. He will put in a sample room we are told.

Mr. Chas. Churchill has taken a fine timber homestead on the withdrawn lands and calculates to make a good home there.

John O. Juve has gone for a month's visit to his Clay Co. farm. He says he intends to make the ducks and chickens suffer.

Mrs. H. P. Smith of St. Vincent, is visiting this week with the family of Dept. Sheriff A. N. Hopkins and friends in town.

Mr. K. Newhouse, of Brandon, Douglas Co., came up to Polk County and took in a fine claim in the thirteen townships. He says Polk County soil is the boss.

Iver Christerson, of Richwood, Becker Co., Minn., has been up to the new promised land on a tour of inspection. He pronounces it all very good and has taken a tree claim up there.

McColough is painting the new Land Office and will have it ready for occupancy by the latter part of the week when the office will be moved into it. The lower part is nearly ready for occupancy as a store.

Our city Marshal Dan McDonald says he is not going to buy any more fresh fish as Frank Zarracher gets them all. This week he bought a fine string of pike of a small boy and told him to take them up home and the urchin took the fish up to Frank Zarracher's residence who lived high for many days off those fish. Dan says that's too thin.

A Land Office Business.

On Friday August 3d the Land Office officials received orders to accept filings upon the lands comprising the thirteen townships that had been withdrawn in 1879 for the purpose of annexation to the White Earth Reservation. Up to last night, August 15th, there had been made 326 Homestead Entries; 394 Preemption Entries; 41 Timber Culture Entries; 26 Cash Entries, 8 Soldier's Homestead Entries and 13 Final Proofs. With the exception of one final proof this amount of business was caused by the throwing of these lands upon the market. The amount of land embraced in those entries is 112,000 acres, not quite five whole townships. In addition to this amount of business there has been a land contest every day and some days two of them. If there is another Land Office in the United States that can show a better record for the same amount of time, with the same amount of help employed we should like to hear about it.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmadge will lecture on "Big Blunders," in Ericsson's Hall, August 21st. [14-16]

THE GLORIOUS DAYS OF COLD.

I remember, I remember,
My boyhood's blizzard blight;
The broken window where the snow
Came drifting in at night.
It came whene'er the fire was out,
When ma had gone away;
But now I wish that icy night
Would come again to stay.

I remember, I remember,
The noses red and white,
The frozen ears that tingled so—
Oh, what a cooling sight!
The snowhouse that my brother built,
And where I used to lie
Until my bones were quite congealed—
Oh, would it now were nigh!

I remember, I remember,
Where I was wont to skate;
The pond as smooth as glist'ning glass,
Whereon I broke my pate.
My buoyant spirit, then so light,
Is hot and heavy now,
And summers pool can no more cool
The fever on my brow.

I remember, I remember,
The cold and icy church;
I used to think the minister
Would freeze fast to his perch.
Those frigid days have passed away,
And now 'tis little joy
To feel that I am much nearer heat
Than when I was a boy.

A SINISTER INCIDENT

A Fragmentary Story Without End or Moral

I.

The thin, spicy smoke of Manila cigars gave a club room a sleepy look, which was increased by the quota of illumination now lacking from several expired wax lights.

Young De Haas' conversation had become somewhat aimless in tone, besides being briefly but frequently punctuated with fits of dozing. Rice was singing a song at three or four gentlemen, whose enthusiasm was now but slightly aroused by the singer's toast, "The ladies."

Drumaway sat overlooking the scene. He was quite alone at that end of the table, his immediate neighbors having gone home or fallen asleep, which amounted to much the same thing.

Drumway saw everything double, and he sipped his wine now in smiling approval of the uproarious efforts of Mr. Rice, again as though to remove from his palate a flavor of staleness.

Mr. Drumway's singularity, or rather plurality, of vision was not occasioned by the wine. A better understanding of it might be given by the statement that there were two of him. His old self had lost his heart and lost the lady—she married Reginald Rivers in 1871—lost ambition, and, to some extent perhaps, pride. It was this old self that approved of Mr. Rice's song and the empty bottles upon the floor and the illogical gentlemen at the other end of the table and the advanced hour to which the clock decorously pointed. His new self had gradually acquired some interest in the business and people of the Eastern land, some philosophy wherewith to shield him from the assaults of circumstance and a temptation to excess, and sufficient cheerfulness to render life not altogether unpleasant in spite of its undertone of sadness. It was the new self that looked upon his present surroundings with a consciousness of staleness in their flavor which has been before remarked.

Drumway's old self had kept him all night at the club; the new self summoned his philosophy—which was, perhaps, no tardier than most people's—and suggested that it was time to go home. Mr. Rice had given over singing, a fact that in his particular case implied a total absence of any one to listen.

The sober New Year's dawn faded the artificial light to a sickly hue, and seemed to scatter ashes upon the young face of De Haas as he slept with his head upon the table.

"Excuse me, gentlemen," said Dr. Spooner, looking in at the door, "I should like—"

"Happy New Year! '83, and the ladies!" roared Rice.

"Yes, yes. So it is. The same to you," returned the doctor abstractedly, as he advanced to the table and cast around it a glance of thorough acquaintance with every liver in the company. "Happy New Year to you, Mr. Drumway. Thank you I will swallow a glass of wine, but I can't stay. The fact is, I've a bad case on hand. Poor devil from some ship, I take it, been knocked down and stabbed in the thigh, and what with drunkenness and lying about in the streets so long the, ah, leg has got to come off. I just ran over here to see if, ah—Mr. Drumway, would you mind holding that a moment?"

Doctor Spooner filled a wine glass until the liquid trembled above the brim. Drumway took the glass carefully from the table, held it up for a few seconds, and set it down. Not a drop was spilled.

"Good!" said the doctor. "Nerves firm. You don't mind the sight of blood, I suppose? Some people are peculiar about that. Perhaps you wouldn't object to render me a little assistance in the operation? It will not take long."

"Not in the least," said Drumway.

Young De Haas, with the gray light of the morning upon him, would not have looked whiter had he been dead. Rice was red and loud. He poured a few drops of the wine upon De Haas' pallid temple, and drank the remainder of the glass to the exceeding good health of Spooner's patients and to "The ladies, the dears!"

II.

Walking through the raw morning air, and keeping pace with the speedy but unhurried steps of the doctor, Drumway felt as though he had been shaken awake by the reality of life.

The room which they entered seemed to be waiting. It waited for the doctor when he excused himself and went into an adjoining chamber waited for the dull, lagging day, and for the future scenes of pain and danger. A long table stood waiting for its next burden—Drumway wondered what had been its last—and upon one end of it were a case of instruments and a bottle labelled "ether"—both expectant. A significant scuffling of feet dissipated most of these impressions, and they were quite put to flight by the appearance of the doctor, superintending movements of two coolies who carried a flaccid bundle which they laid upon the table as Spooner directed. The bundle was dirty and wretched, yet the room and the table and the instruments seemed to be satisfied now they had got it. The doctor laid out the instruments to his mind, and unwound the bandages from the sufferer's leg.

"There," said he, dipping the ether bottle upon a sponge, and dividing the remark between Drumway and himself, "no time to be lost here I take it."

The meaning odor of the ether bottle filled the room.

"What—what are you going to do!" asked the patient in a stupid, half-frightened tone, and trying to keep the doctor in sight.

"To save your life—I think."

"No! no!" exclaimed the man, as the sponge was placed over his mouth and nostrils. "Not that! I'd rather—"

"Hold him!" said Spooner, with quiet earnestness. "He's astonishingly strong yet."

The man writhed powerfully, uttered a broken sentence, moaned out some inarticulate words, became quiet, and fell into that mysterious state of waiting which seemed to belong to everything in the apartment.

"Now, Drumway, quick!" said the doctor. "Hold the sponge so, and keep it there until I tell you to move it. What's the matter? Not going to faint, are you?"

"No, no, no. It's the ether, perhaps. You may depend upon me: I'm quite I myself."

At the weak muffled sound of the patient's voice Drumway had turned very white, and glanced quickly to the wound upon which his attention had been fixed, to the man's ghastly unshaven face. He did not look particularly reliable as he took the sponge, and Spooner's countenance became a shade more serious.

The surgeon worked busily. The instruments rattled, and there was a grating sound like that sometimes heard in butcher's shops.

The two Drumways were more distinct than ever. This one held the sponge with tolerable steadiness, and watched the doctor's work in a sort of awful fascination; that one flew back over sea and time. The old Drumway saw a church with carriages and a strip of carpet across the sidewalk before it; heard the "Wedding March" peal from the organ, and felt the old despair. He saw the curious ones bending forward, smelt the fragrance of orange-flowers—strangely mixed with a sickening fume of ether—and saw her pass down the aisle with—what nightmare was here! How could this filthy, maimed, half-drunken wretch have been the hero of that day? And where was she? Dead, or broken-hearted? What miserable history had this miserable end?

The room was very still. Drumway heard a faint rattle under the sponge and Spooner looked suddenly at the patient's face. The man's jaw had dropped.

"The devil!" from the doctor.

"Good God!" from Drumway.

Odd, was it not, that they should have meant nearly the same thing.

"Take away the sponge! take away the sponge!" exclaimed Spooner.

He shook the body roughly, struck the chest, and cast water in the face. He worked hard, and the perspiration came out in beads upon his forehead, but the patient—tired, perhaps, of waiting so long—had left upon the table only a "subject."

"Very unfortunate," said Spooner, in a tone of disappointment. "I wished I had looked a moment sooner. But there. One is never sure. This life is a very curious thing."—W. S. Richardson, in Boston Courier.

A NEW YORK MISSION.

The Work of Two Young Men in a Strange Field.

"Here, young feller! ain't it most time you were going home?"

This invitation was put by a stalwart policeman to a young man standing in earnest conversation at 2 o'clock in the morning in the Bowery with one of the flashily dressed girls who roam about the great democratic highway of the metropolis at all hours of the night. The officer spoke bluntly but not unkindly. The man addressed, who was tall and well clad, arrested the frightened motion of the girl by a gentle touch of the hand, while he held out a printed card to the policeman without reply. The officer took it, bending a searching glance on the two, and turned it to the lamp-light. It bore the name of Henry Gibbud, with the brief characterization, "All-night Missionary."

"All right, sir!" said the policeman, handing back the card promptly, with a glance in which respect and pity were curiously mingled. "I wish you luck. But she is a tough 'un," and went on his beat. The look of defiance the girl shot after him showed that she was hurt and boded ill for the present success of the missionary's effort to rouse her better feelings. He saw it, and with friendly nod and hand-shake left her, exacting of her the promise to see him on the following night at a meeting in McGlory's in Hester street.

The man who walked slowly up the street, addressing here and there in words of friendly inquiry and advice, that were alike received with respectful attention, groups of girls or young men or solitary wanderers, was one of the two missionaries who conduct the Florence Night mission in Bleecker street. The other, Smith N. Allen, who is known extensively as "the lame peddler," was at that hour prosecuting similar mission work in other quarters of the city where dens of gilded vice abound. The work in which these two men are engaged is to a great extent novel and unique; but, unpromising as the field seemed, it has already borne fruit that gives hope of an abundant harvest.

It is due, from the start, to the restless and uncompromising energy of Mr. Allen, who is recognized as the head of the present mission. Both missionaries are young men, not yet turned thirty, and went into work together years ago for love of it, urged by earnest conviction. Their labors were divided between the docks and the vile dens of drunkenness and infamy of Baxter street, when the case of a girl, a wretched creature, young in years but old in vice to the lowest depths, fell under the notice of Mr. Allen.

He made it his special charge to rescue her from the street, and with a dogged persistance that drew upon him almost the ridicule of his colaborer, he followed her about night after night, brought her from the saloons out of the company of her drunken associates into his meetings picked her from the gutter again and again, until at last she surrendered and consented to be taken by him to the Magdalen Asylum. The girl is now leading a Christian life. The result was a revelation to both missionaries, and turned their efforts into a channel where it has run since.—New York World.

Women and Life Insurance.

Dr. Wm. A. Hammond has caused something in the nature of a sensation by a statement in a paper called the North American, that life insurance companies refuse to insure women's lives on account of woman's inability to be exact in regard to her age, the diseases she may have had, her mode of life, and other matters in which exactness is required." A New York interviewer on reading this promptly sought out an insurance agent and ascertained that in many cases not the precise reason that women were less fancied risks than men. The chief objection to women was because of the difficulty of making a physical examination. They did not take a man's word for his physical condition any more than a woman's. They had his body examined thoroughly by a surgeon. Of course women, from motives of delicacy, would not submit to this. Another agent declared that the only reason a woman was disliked for insurance risks was because of the extraordinary perils to American women in child-bearing, the percentage of deaths being far greater than in any other nation. It appears that whatnesses are against Dr. Hammond and that the insurance companies do not doubt woman's ability to state facts.

It is said that British capital to the amount of $30,000,000 went into Wyoming and Texas last year.

FIELD AND FARM.

Farmers' Items.

Calves' rennet reduced fine and given to any animal troubled with scours will effect a speedy cure.

The great boom in hops has collapsed. The projectors were sure when they had forced the price from 16 cents to $1.15, a pound that they could carry it up to $1.60, and perhaps even $2, before this year's crop came in. Now good hops are 25 to 28 cents, and choice 35 to 40 cents. An unexpected supply from Australia was the principal cause of the break.

A barrel of salt, costing from one to three dollars, according to locality, will do more than ten times that amount of good if sprinkled over hay when either stacked or mowed. The heating of the stack will dissolve it, and it will diffuse over the entire mass, making even the coarsest grass to be relished by stock. It will also tend to preserve and sweeten the hay and save it from becoming musty if it should chance not to be thoroughly dried. A four-quart measure full, to an ordinary-sized load, will be sufficient.

Peaches begin to arrive, but they are a very indifferent article, the best, however, which our hucksters can procure. A good article may be expected soon.

The state fair offers $300 in premiums for herds of fat cattle, being $100 for best herd of five three years old, $100 for two years old, and $100 for one year old.

August is the month that most foul weeds ripen their seed. Their destruction now will not aid the present crop, but will save a world of work and and trouble next year.

In a warm, wet season, where drainage is deficient, too much water falls for hard pan soils, it lies on the surface, mingles with the vegetable matter and they both become sour, and as a consequence the fields become red with sorrel or white with daisies. They spring up as an effort of nature to throw off this acidity in the soil. A sour soil is incapable of growing sweet or nutritious grasses. In chemistry it takes an alkali to neutralize an acid, they have the same effect in a sour soil, and when applied, daisies and sorrel disappear.

Good Bread From Poor Flour.

Our flour has been of inferior quality lately, and I feel quite exultant over the fact that I have, at last, after many experiments succeeded in making it into really good bread. My success followed this method.

At noon take the dry potato crumbs from the bottom of the kettle and mash about one cupful of them fine and smooth; pour over them a pint of boiling water. When nearly cool add half a yeast cake or half a cup of soft yeast and set away in a cool place. (Through the summer I keep the bread in process of rising in the pantry away from the heat of the stove.) In the evening make a sponge by scalding a small quantity of flour, after adding cold water to cool it sufficiently to bear the finger, pour in the prepared yeast which should by this time be covered with froth. After the sponge is well beaten leave until morning—then as early as possible, thicken and knead it thoroughly. Leave it until it is well risen then knead again. Repeat this three times before putting it in the baking pans, and you will have light, sweet and tender loaves that will double in size while baking.—Exchange.

Our Home—The Boy's Room.

From Rural New Yorker.

Beautiful homes are now seen, where forty years ago stood the log-cabin of the energetic pioneers, who by industry and perseverence founded the "sweet home" of to-day. The old house has been removed. The logs, and shakes, and puncheons have crumbled to dust or been made into ashes. The door, with its latch-string, tells no more of hospitality. The shade trees are nearly as large as the forest trees. The fruit grandpa planted is now gathered by the children, who in many instances "Rise up and call him blessed" (i. e.) if the trees were grafted. The sweet old-fashioned lilac and snow-ball, that were sent to grandma from "the East" and watched by her so tenderly, bloom each year and happy children love the flowers grandma sees no more. The new house differs from the old one in every respect, excepting the kitchen, the workmanship of which is finer. There is no fireplace, or "dutch oven," or no poles overhead on which to dry pumpkins or apples, no peg on which to hang the perforated tin lantern with its tallow candle, which has gone out, never to shine again; but the plan of the kitchen is in other respects the stereotyped edition of the old house. I mention this room first, as it is usually the first room seen in the average county house. The dining-room, sitting-room, parlor and sleeping-rooms are usually tastefully furnished, bright and cosy, excepting the "boys room," which very often is the most shabbily furnished room in the house. "The boys are so rough," is the excuse. Try polishing their room, and see if it will not take some of the roughness from its occupants Ragged quilts must be on the bed, "the boys tear them so." Put on good bedding—make the bed look nice, and they will have too much respect and good sense to destroy things. A carpet, a washstand and all articles considered essential in other sleeping apartments ought to be in the boys' room. Some of the fancy articles the girls have made, and wondered where in the world to put them, would brighten up this forlorn looking place. A piece of sand-paper with something bright around the edge, fastened to the wall near the match-holder, with a burnt-match receiver fastened below it, will save the wall from being "all scratched up by the boys." If a button comes off when they are dressing, a box with needles and thread will save running all over the house to find some one to sew it on, but with the material right at hand can sew it on himself. Make their room look nice and you will not be troubled with muddy boots tracking all the way to the "boys' room." Even the lower animals love a clean nest. The average hen is not lower than the brute I know.

Country Roads.

Everything which the farmer does off his own land is greatly affected by the condition of the roads. All his many loads of surplus farm products are drawn over them, and it makes some difference to him and to his horses whether those loads are conveyed easily over hard, smooth surfaces, or dragged through mud, and against stones with excess of labor to the team, fatigue to the driver, and wear and breakage to the wagon. Every week he and his family, more or less, go to the village for numberless errands, or to church on the Sabbath, and the good or bad conditions of the roads seems to affect every drive, pleasantly or unpleasantly, of their feeling or nervous sensations. On an average, there is at least twenty miles of traveling each week for the members of a single family. It would make a difference of $5 a week, everything counted, whether this teaming and traveling is done over a nice, comfortable road or through mud-holes, sloughs, ruts, and unbridged streams, or against stones. Five dollars a week amounts to $250 a year, a snug little sum to tax the farmer with; and when this sum is multiplied by at least 5,000,000 owners or drivers of horses, carriages, wagons, heavy teams, etc., the aggregate cost would be something over a billion dollars! Does any one say this is too large an estimate? Then proceed in detail and shew in what particulars; but do not blindly and ignorantly say it is wrong without careful examination. Suppose however, we admit that it is double the reality, is not the 600,000,000 every year, expended directly or indirectly by our people, worthy of more attention on the part of patriots, statesmen, politicians, office seekers, public-spirited men, writers for newspapers, agricultural journalists, and in fact of every one who passes over a road?

So long as our public highways in most parts of the country are made and repaired with so little interest and so little thought, we must suffer an enormous loss. We would like to ask how many of our readers, who drive or ride over the common roads, never see a loose stone, or a fixed stone, to strike, jolt, and batter every passing wheel, or who do not see hundreds of them, which might be removed with the expenditure of a small portion of the road tax? How many never saw sods and muck scraped into the road-bed, to form a highway or "turnpike," which would be excellent for corn and potatoes, but which when worked into a mass of mud, or cut into ruts a foot deep, constitute a strange object to be called a "road?" How many never saw along the roadsides thrifty patches of thistles, burdocks, mulleins, johnswort, nettles, etc., etc., ready to seed all the neighbors' fields? Until we can find such happy persons in the majority, we hope more attention may be given to correcting these evils, although we would not lessen the praiseworthy attention which is now freely accorded to enterprises and interests of almost infinitely less importance, but good in their small way.—Country Gentleman.

Keeping Old Cows.

It pays to run a machine as long as it can be made to return a fair profit on the cost of operating it. Using the old machine saves interest on a new investment, and the continued wear does not decrease its value, for the waste material in a condemned machine whether it is wholly or only half worn out. The case is quite different with farm stock, which can be used as food when it begins to diminish in usefulness to it owner. The man who keeps an ox or cow till it pines with old age, is a double loser by so doing. It invariably costs more in food and care to maintain an old animal than a young one. As the vigor of life fails, digestion is less perfect and assimilation slower and more difficult, and the waste is greater. As the decline goes on more and more food is required to produce a given amount of labor, or milk, or meat. Old animals can seldom be fattened at a profit, even if their flesh was as valuable as that of younger ones, because it requires so much more time and feed to do it. But their flesh is not equal to that of animals in their prime, so there is a loss both in the quality and the cost of producing. Old cows that have been milked till their life force has been exhausted make very poor and low-priced as well as expensive beef. When a cow has reached twelve to fourteen years of age, it hardly pays to fatten her, if she could be had for nothing. Some cows of extraordinary quality may be profitably kept as long as they can be, for the sake either of stock or milk, but average cows are better converted into beef before it would be appropriate to call them old. —National Live Stock Journal.

Household Scraps.

Moths may be partially kept out of carpets by washing the floor, before the carpet is laid, with spirits of turpentine or benzine.

Scratches on furniture may be refinished by rubbing with a woolen rag dipped in boiled linseed oil. The varnishing may then be done with shellac dissolved in alcohol.

Gilt frames may be cleaned by applying heated alcohol, with a sponge, until all stains are effaced. The alcohol is then allowed to dry gradually; under no circumstances rub it with a cloth.

Cracks in Floors.—A very complete filling for open cracks in floors may be made by thoroughly soaking newspapers in a paste made of one pound of flour, three quarts of water and a table spoonful of alum, thoroughly boiled and mixed; make the final mixture about as thick as paper-putty, and it will harden like paper-mache.

Window curtains of open work linen, white and ecru, with colored silk, are quite pretty. Light blue and cherry silk are pleasant colors.

A mantel lambrequin of felt is attractive. The edge may be cut in points and a plush fan appliqued to each point; each fan should be differently shaped.

Hair Tonic.—One ounce of chloroform, one ounce of stronger water of ammonia, one ounce of glycerine, five ounces of alcohol. The lotion to be rubbed on the head after thorough friction with the brush. It may be applied two or three times a week. If too strong, or strong enough to make the head smart, it may be diluted with water.

As to cake, of various kinds, the less you make the better, for summer. It does very well in cold weather to keep a supply on hand; but it is not nice, or healthy to eat much rich cake in the summer. The less meat and rich food, one takes into the stomach, the better they feel; and the heat does not prostrate so sensibly, as when they are fed with indigestible compounds, therefore, use what eggs you need in the family, and if there is a surplus they can be sold.

Leprosy in the Pacific Coast.

It is asserted by a San Francisco paper that leprosy is becoming more and more frequent among the Caucasians of the Pacific coast. It used to be held that leprosy is not contagious, and that it rarely if ever affected white people, but the California experience has been painfully to the contrary. Just now the case of Erick Erickson, a Swedish sailor, is attracting attention. He is lying at the pest-house, step by step approaching a horrible, loathsome death. He came from Merced. A year ago he noticed a peculiar swelling of the hands. This symptom was followed by the appearance of large, red blotches and pustules on his arms and legs. They resembled the signs of the tertiary of a venereal disease, and Erickson was at first treated for that disorder. But the remedies were unavailing. Finally the telltale yellow hue came over his skin. The man now presents a dreadful sight, his flesh rotting away by inches, with scarcely a sound spot on his entire body. It seems advisable to the authorities of the coast town to declare quarantine against the Hawaiian Islands, which are infected with leprosy. The cholera would certainly be more welcome than this awful plague.

HOW TO LIVE IN PERSIA.

A Man's Position Reckoned by the Quantity of His Dinner—A Delightfully Cheap Place.

From "The Land of the Lion."

To magnify one's own consequence is the only comfortable way of getting on in Persia. Dr. Willis gives a characteristic illustration of this in the course of a description of a medical visit to a certain governor:

At seven, after having prescribed for him, I escaped to my quarters under the pretext of dining and lay down to rest. At nine my servant informed me that my dinner was about to be served and a large circular tray, having some six dishes on it, and with bread and all et ceteras, a huge bowl of iced sherbet and a bottle of wine, was brought in, I was very hungry, anxious to fall to and I felt a sense of anguish when, to my astonishment, my servant, (whom I brought from Shiraz,) assuming the part of the governor of Barataria's physician, ordered the whole away in an indignant voice.

As soon as my dinner had disappeared I demanded an explanation of my man. It was this: "I know, sahib, that the dinner I sent away was quite enough for the sahib, and a good dinner, but here in Persia a man's position is reckoned by the quantity of dinner sent him and the number of plats. They have sent you six plats. I have told them that you couldn't think of dining on less than eighteen, and if I allowed you to eat the dinner that was sent, good as it was, you would be looked down on. Are you less than the prince's physician? Certainly not. They would send him, or rather he would demand, at least twelve plats. I assure you I am acting in your interest."

I suppose the fellow was right. Dinner for at least twenty-four persons was brought on three huge trays. I tasted some half-dozen well-cooked dishes, and then my servant removed the rest, and I observed him, with the master of the house and numerous hangers-on dining in the open air with the very copious dinner that remained. The man was right. Such are some of the ways a Persian has of keeping up his consequences.

Living in Persia is of a delightful cheapness. Dr. Wills occupied in Julfa a handsome and convenient house, which cost him altogether about $400. He lived luxuriously in Ispahan keepten servants, at a cost of only $50 a month, for only $2,500 a year.

Saved By Death.

The corps of locomotive engineers is affluent in heroic men. In the good time coming, when the victories of peace shall be, indeed, as renowned as those of war, some simple decoration, such as the "Iron Cross" with which Germany adorns her bravest sons, shall be seen clinging to the breast of scores of these griny men. The other day, the express train was running at forty miles an hour from Summerville to Charleston, S. C. A misplaced switch turned the train from the main track to a siding, whereon stood two loaded freight cars.

The engineer, J. S. Smith, saw that a collision was inevitable. He knew that the shock would kill him if he did not instantly jump from his cab. But he stood at his post, though to remain was to enter the jaws of death. With one hand he pulled the lever that reversed the engine, and with the other hand turned the valve which let on the air brakes.

The engine struck the loaded car and was broken into a hundred pieces. Under the iron wreck the engineer's body was found, cut in two by a bar of steel. But he had saved his train; not one passenger was injured.

Some day, when the teachings of that heroic, meek, patient, humble spirit, who gave His life for men, have worked the regeneration of earth, it will be realized that the common daily tasks open a heroic career. Then it will be seen that those who wear the laurel wreath are not the only victors.

Interview with President Hunt.

Our gun-workers at South Boston are the only ones in the country except those at West Point, but their manufacture has been mostly of Parrott guns, and they have never made a gun weighing more than ten tons. Ours is the only concern that can make large guns, and we have before now made guns weighing fifty odd tons. Our capacity, owing to the policy of our Government, is no greater than twenty years ago. Since the close of the war of the rebellion we have had large contracts with the Government of Spain, Chili, Peru, the Argentine Republic, Italy, Turkey, Russia and China. In the course of time with the wars of the world an ordinary amount of business. But when our contracts closed at home, we very naturally lost a foreign trade. In the mean-time, other governments have encouraged gun-works by giving them orders, as Krupp's establishment in Germany, Armstrong's at Woolwich, in England, and Schneider's at Cruesot, in France, are to-day overrun with orders. We could not make the steel guns in this country if we wanted to, but have largely increased facilities for forging steel. In Europe, for instance, at Krupp's works, they have 100-ton hammers for forging, while the largest we have in this country is 17-ton. The steel for the six-inch guns which we made last year, we had to procure in Europe.

Would Burn His Shirt.

Metellus of Macedon was evidently a sly old fellow, and he used to say "he would burn his shirt if it knew his true intentions." Were he living to-day, he would no doubt burn his shirt to get a bottle of Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters, if he could not "catch on" in any other way, for it is well known, the old fellow was a confirmed dyspeptic and longed for a remedy for the chronic derangement of the liver and system. The Cruise of the Jemima.

Charlie, my younger brother, had been fagging at his studies; I had just passed the R. C. S. E., and was proportionately elate. We had earned our summer holiday, we thought; and nothing loth was I when Charlie, with a map in his hand, pointed out a spot on the Caithness coast and exclaimed:

"Here we are! There we'll go! What say you, Frank?"

"Very good choice. Plenty of ozone, fishing and boating; fashion at a discount. Where is the time-table?"

A primitive fishing village—call it Clanhead—was quickly fixed upon, and after the usual delights of railway travelling we found ourselves in a place richly endowed by nature, but minus an inn.

A highland cottage, however, proved a comfortable shelter; and after a night's rest and a hearty fish breakfast we strolled off towards the sea.

In the one straggling street of Clanhead were yellow-haired children, who stood in wide-eyed, innocent wonder and stared at us. Perhaps they were overcome by the sight of our hideous brown sand shoes; or it might have been that they were bewitched by Charlie's handsome face.

Charlie is the Adonis of our family; and I, well, I am an ugly young man with a marvellously wide mouth, eyesight so near that I cannot pick up a sixpence without the help of my glasses, and an expression, to say the least of it, seared.

Such as we were, we stood the lads' and lasses' scrutiny unabashed, plodding on until we perceived a middle-aged man leaning on a gate in, I imagined, a docle far niente condition. He turned, however, and moved toward us.

"Wil ye no' be takin' a sail this mornin' gentlemen?"

"Just what we want," cried Charlie.

"A weel, tak' ye the first turn to the reet an' it'll bring ye to the head o' the cliff. Some way bock ye'll see the openin' to a ravine. Gang awa through the gap an' ye'll soon be where the sea washes the cliff foot. Be ye canny, for tide's high the noo, an' the shallowest water there may droun ye. In five minutes I'll be comin' roond wi' my boat an' my mate at your service."

The boatman touched his cap and moved off; we made for the ravine, passed down it, and came suddenly upon the most magnificent expanse of rolling water that our eyes had ever feasted upon.

Shortly, from, I suppose, some sheltering nook under the cliff, came along our little craft, the Jemima, with her mainsail spread and her master at the helm, while Donald, his mate, kept watch at the bow.

With a "Yo hoy! Steady! Yo hoy!" she was "brought to," and in scrambled we, neck or nothing.

We were scarcely seated before emerging from the ravine, toiling on with the help of a crutch over loose earth and bowlders, came a girl with a sweet but very sad face. Evidently she was suffering in mind and body.

"Ech Hinny! Hinny!" said our boatman with a softened intonation. "Ye should na act sae, my dear! When gentlemen hire the Jemima they dinna expect to tak' her master's family aboord. Gang awa, hame again. Mamie"

"Oh, by all means, take your friend aboard, Mr.—"

"Ben, is my name, sir, an' I thank ye for your kindness. Come then, Bairn! an' look ye, dinna trust to your crutch, when ye step aboord. Should the boat luff, it may slip frae under ye. Let me lay it doon at the stern, an' gi'e me your hond. Now, steady, an, in ye are."

Presently I ventured to ask if she were not an invalid, and returned Ben;

"Oh, yes, sir; an' she is my only Pretty doo! She married over early. An' a week after, Tam, her husband sailed north wi' his crew for the fishin.' Three months has passed sin' the wofu, day, but nea word can we get o' boat or men."

"Then you think the vessel—"

"Went doon sir is what ye mean? There is nae doot aboot it; for miles awa' along coast, a piece of her sail was washed ashore. But my lamb knosna that; an' sae, i'stead o' puttin' on widow's weeds, she aye says we'se bound to to find him; an' she watches the sea an' questions ever fishermon she meets till it's just pitifu' to hear her."

"She is nearly distraught," thought I Then I gave Ben a warning note regarding the imperative need of trying to divert her mind from trouble. Also I profferred a word of advice about her lameness, which, it appeared arose from some recent injury done to the muscles, and which I gathered, had been treated in anything but a scientific manner.

Ben guided the boat off, then turned to the girl again. "Eh, my bairnie, not sae mickle as a speck a' head-gear! an' they bits, o' fallal clothing flying about ye; ye'll catch your death! ye maun hae my jacket on. Mebbe, sir, ye'll be sae to haud the tiller while I dress her up? There now, Mamie, are ye no warmly buskit?"

Off we went before the wind, our swelling mainsail hiding the man at the bow. The grand sea and sky threw Charlie and myself into ecstacies; Ben, used to such scenes, was quiet and, I thought, sad, while the lassie looked decidedly sleepy.

"Eh, my doo,', said Ben, "ye were oop wi' the birds; I marked ye wendin' your way to the cliff, by the first glint o' the sun, Ye'se liken to a wraith, my dearie! ye'se aye wanderin' Aweel lay doon your head awhile on my shoulder, an' be takin, a wee bit nap the noo."

With his disengaged arm Ben supported the frail little body, and soon his charge was dozing as restfully as any weary child.

As she slept I espied a wedding ring on her finger, and even in repose her face told of mental and bodily suffering. Some heavy calamity, I thought, must have fallen upon her, Her childlike confidence in Ben and his tenderness towards her were pathetic; and altogether my sympathy was won.

Ben was most delighted to find that I was a doctor, and most grateful for my interest in him. Indeed he was so earnest in pouring out his thanks when I volunteered to take Mamie's case in hand while I was at Clanhead that the man at the bow (as he afterwards owned) became a sympathetic listener; for Mamie and he had been playmates, and he felt rather down-hearted, Ben told me when Tom carried her off.

Deep in our subject, and entirley free from apprehension, we scudded pleasantly along. One moment all our thoughts were of healing the next—crash! crash! ! crash! ! ! over our heads under our feet, everywhere!

A swift glance at the mainsail, a wrench at the tiller, and a tremendous shout from Ben:

"Bow, there bow! are ye sleepin' mon?"

The warning was too late! A large vessel was down upon us; our mainsail was pierced by her bowsplit; our timbers were shivering under her bows. I heard shouting on the deck above us; I saw a man leap from the vessel's side; I saw Mamie wake up in an agony of terror, and throw her arms around her father's neck; I heard Ben say, "Nae, dinna cumber me, but strike ye oct an' trust." I knew we were all in water, for I saw Ben supporting his child as he swam vigorously toward the man who had leaped over. I saw Charley going down (neither he nor I was a swimmer), I clutched at him fruitlessly; then came confused cries of "Keep your heads up!" "Here's a life belt!" "Catch this rope!" and so on. But soon the voices sounded far away and indistinguishable; I knew that salt water was in my nostrils and mouth; there was singing in my ears, roaring in my head. I felt a mad impulse to rise; I did rise, again for a minute only, I heard eager voices near me, and caught a glimpse of the efforts that were being made to save us; in an agony I made an effort to keep up; it was futile; then hiss! hiss! swish! through my very brain; after that, darkness, dense darkness! a clear consciousness that the hand of death was on me; a cry from my inmost soul to heaven, and—a strange deep calm.

* * * * *

The sun was going down in a flood of crimson glory. I lay upon a well-swabbed deck all alone. Where had I been? Where was I going? What had happened? I pinched myself and felt the pain; so I was still in flesh. I tried my voice—"Hi! hilloa! somebody!"

No one came. I sat up and took a speculative survey. The vessel was taut and trim and she smelt of timber, but she was not of British build. As I cogitated—rather tweakly, I must own—a footstep sounded on the deck, and along came a good-natured looking seaman, fair, and blue-eyed; he made his way to me and gazed smilingly down.

"What ship is this?" queried I.

A shake of the head.

"Are you a German?"

Two shakes of the head.

"Speak, man, in some tongue or other, will you?"

The word "speak" he understood, and obeyed with energy. But no word of any language could I pick out from his jabber.

Feeling no doubt that my understanding wanted arousing, he went away and shortly returned with six other men; some strong, fair and blue-eyed like himself, the rest, shorter, darker, but powerfully built, and all chattering unintelligible jargon.

As they bent their energies to make me acquainted with something or other, I tried hard to discover their nationalities, for, certainly they were not all of one nation, when—happy thought! came flitting through my brain the words:

And then the blue-eyed Norseman told
A sage o' the days of old.

"You are from Norway!" bawled I. "And you," to the darker men, "you are Swedes. Am I right?"

"Ha! Norroway! Norge! Norge! Ha! Ha! Norrike! Ha! Ha!"

These words were taken up like a refrain with boisterous satisfaction. Had I only raised my eyes to the vessel's flag, I might have seen at first that she was called the Jarl Hakon. But just then my wits were scattered. They began, however, to disentangle themselves and thoughts of Charlie, Ben and the rest crowded upon me. Where were they? Where were they? Where was the lame girl? and where the Jemima?

It was useless to question, so I rose up and with rather unsteady gait walked across the deck and found my way to the captain's cabin.

On one side lay Ben, with pain in every line of his face; in the captain's berth, looking absolutely death; and by Mamie stretched out on a rug lay my brother. He, however, managed to moan out "Bravo!" when he saw me.

I went to the girl's side and felt her pulse. Then, "where's the captain?" said I to Ben's careless mate, Donald, who was standing by, the picture of helpless distress.

"Here," came a ready answer from a mellow voice behind me.

I turned. There stood a portly, gray-headed man, with a trustworthy face. He spoke English; this was worth something just then.

"Have you a wife—a lady on board, sir, who will carry out my instructions respecting this patient?"

"Are you then a physician.

"I am a member of the College of Surgeons, and am auxious to do my best in this emergency."

"I am heartily glad, sir. A lady—no; there is not one on board. But there is a man who would lay down his life for this child. He is burly, but docile; let him be her nurse."

"Oh, her father? But he is in sorry plight himself. I fear I shall find some broken bones when I have time to look at him."

"No, not her father—her husband."

I glanced at Ben.

"I know," said he; "there's a reet bright siller linin' to oor clood, thank God!"

"Bring him in," quoth I.

He came, a young fellow, having a splendid physique and six feet two in height, the very man who had leaped from the side of the Jarl Hakon to our rescue.

I stretched out my arm in front of the berth as a warning or barrier. But Tame had tact and caution. He stood mutely looking down on his ghostly young wife, then, in response to a touch on his arm, he bent his head to take my orders.

While Mamie remained unconscious he was to keep his post quietly, using the prescribed remedies; the moment she showed signs of consciousness he was to vanish.

I turned to Ben, who I found had a broken arm. "Splints!" said I to Charlie, who was on his feet by this time. "Go to the captain for thin wood, and tools to shape it, also linen for bandages—a sheet will do. Now, Ben, you are a Briton, I know, will you trust me to set that bone?"

"Trust ye? Aye, sir; I ne'er wince at sic like. I'd be poorly off an' it werena set"

That business was got through, and Ben had scarcely uttered a moan from first to last, but cold perspiration stood on his forehead, and I was just dispatching Donald for a strong cup of tea to revive him when—a sudden knock on my arm.

I turned sharply. "Beg pardon, sir," whispered Tam, as his great bulk rolled and tumbled into a dark corner beyond me.

But Mamies eyes were wide open, the whiteness had gone from her face; her breath came thick and fast; she even tried to raise herself on her elbow.

"Father! father! Ye'se found my Tam!"

Quaking with fear lest the remedy should be worse than the disease, I motioned Tam out from his hiding-place.

I saw the girl's face flush violently; I saw her throw up her arms to clasp her husband's neck; I saw the young giant turn white and weak with emotion; then away darted I, never halting till I reached the stern. Tyro as I was, I would rather have set a half dozen more bones than stood out that meeting.

The captain was there, and very soon we got into conversation. Here is the substance of what he told me:

The Jarl Hakon was doing a pine trade between Bergan and Aberdeen. On her last homeward voyage she had picked up Tam and another seaman who were beating hopelessly about in a small boat, half dead with thirst and exhaustion, Tam's fine frame had battled through, and he was working his way back to Scotland; but his companion in peril had sucembed, and was laid in a Norwegian grave.

* * * * *

Mamie walked without her crutch before I left Clanhead, and Ben's bone was doing famously. I was in high spirits at my success as surgeon on my own account. I had gained friends, too, staunch and leal. Said Tam at parting:

"Ye'se gi'en me a bonny wife for a sickly ane, an' I'll ne'er thank ye onoo, sir."

"All right, Tam, you saved my life when you leaped from the Jarl Hakon, you know, so we'ae more than quits. And look here, lad, if ever you want a friend send to me."

"Sae I will, sir; an' suld ye e'er need an act of reet willin' an' faithfu' service, ye'll send to me?"

That compact was an honest one, and it will stand. M. ONLEY.

THE FRONTIER WOMEN.

Enthusiastic Admiration for the Sex in the Great Wild West.

From the Boston Herald.

Western women are injured in the last way in which a woman has been spoiled—by too much attention. As you proceed toward the unfenced prairie the west becomes more and more the paradise of women. Almost all distinctions are personal, and it is only in a few of the cities that social heirarchies have begun to form. Indeed the queen of one of the great railway principalities of the northwest was herself a servant and is still a servant and is not ashamed of it. Throughout the villages it is thought a social distinction to wait upon the table well. In fact, in the frontier cities the waitresses at the hotels are persons of no slight consequence. A request for a cup of coffee; if not made with proper humility, is often met with the rejoinder: "Will you have it now or will you wait till you get it?"—a joke that, however stale, enjoys great prosperity with all except one of its hearers. Every thrifty waitress is indeed a real estate magnate. She has her three claims—homestead, pre-emption and free, which, when proved up, give her a kingdom as large as many an old German state. The majority of the girls of the northwest are, however, schoolmistresses. To have been a schoolmistress is there regarded as a title of nobility, though the order is so large there is nothing invidious about it. The diverse fountains from which the male and female aristocracies of the frontier spring are remarkable. Sober bartenders constitute the former, schoolmistresses the latter. "Did you not keep a bar on the Jim river or the Cheyenne!" is a safe question to ask any local millionaire who is assuming too much of the air of the Bourbon or the Hapsburg. But the hundreds of mettlesome schoolmistresses, who in spring and autumn gather their little flocks together in the island huts that dot the waving fields of grass and wheat—no state could have a better foundation for its intellect and morality. In the summer the girls are engaged gathering the harvest, for which they are paid $2 a day or more. In the winter they work at home and indulge in social rreeation.

Bathing at Fashionable Resorts.

Bathing, says the Hour, is better managed now at the more fashionable Atlantic resorts. Large gangs of spectators are impossible. Nor would they be permitted. Only friends of the family are invited to bathe with the ladies, although no one can help the sudden appearance of any chance visitor who has the entree of the grounds; and consequently of the beach. The most uncomfortable part of the operation of bathing is the work of divesting one's self of a suit worn in the water and of re-attiring in proper form. But if one can become entirely dry before changing clothing, there is no annoyance to fear. So ladies coming out of the water sometimes recline on warm rocks for an hour or two. Who dare object? Not their parents, for they seldom happen to be present; neither is their any protest from the gentlemen young or otherwise, who happen to be present, for art and nature are twin impulses of the modern age, and where can a young men learn more of both than lounging near rocks on which beauty reclines, or to speak plainly, lays itself out to dry? Can the gentlemen help being present or arriving at the scene, can they go away without offending the ladies? But not all bathers know how to lounge gracefully on stony couches. There are some who prefer to relieve the discomfort of clinging raiment, no matter how thin or honest, by active exercise, so they run on the beach. And what can be prettier than a bevy of maidens in kindly but determined athletic rivalry? No constricting deceptive corsets restrain their lungs and spirits; no skirts impede their progress; no shoes clog their pretty feet, and not even a stocking, with its inevitable garter, prevents the full play of healthy muscle. Afar off—so it seems to the eager masculine spectator—several of them start abreast for an innocent race along the sands. As they come near, with their cheeks glowing, their bosoms panting, their hair streaming in the wind, the observer unconsciously becomes a student as eager as if this was his last opportunity on earth to regard nature's most perfect workmanship. As they fly past, the student unconsciously discovers that Miss A. is not as thin as she appears when in her daily attire; that Miss B.'s entire foot is as pretty as a mere tip, which is all that ever was exposed to the gaze of select society; that Miss C. has not a bust as ample as would seem to a casual acquaintance; and that Miss D.'s pedal extremities, from the lower edge of the bathing-robe downward, banish all memories of the fascinating waltzer. All that a man learns in such moments is truth—truth unalloyed and undistorted. Should he, therefore, object to receiving the lesson, or should his fair acquaintances shrink at imparting it? He could not learn such things elsewhere, about such choice beings, without fear of the police or of irate fathers, brothers, or lovers; but at the seashore—blessed be the mysteries of etiquette—woman is unabashed as Eve before Adam, and almost as slightly adorned.

John Sullivan's Mother Righteously Indignant.

An anecdote which I heard the other day of the famous Sullivan family of New England may not be uninteresting here.

When that sturdy Irish woman, to whom the Sullivan family may well look back with pride, was crossing the Atlantic on her way to the new county, and was asked "Why do you come to America?" she answered, "To raise governors for them," little dreaming that she would live to see one of her sons governor of New Hampshire, and another governor of Massachusetts, though I am sorry to say the third did not do much honor to his family, and was known as "Devil Jim." The story goes that soon after John Sullivan rose to be governor of New Hampshire he desired to give a grand dinner to a number of distinguished guests. A member of his family at the time was his mother, and fearing she would not be equal to the occasion, he concluded it would be best to arrange for her non-appearance at the dinner-table.

Approaching the matter as gently as possible, he soon succeeded in making the quickwitted old lady understand the drift of his diplomatic talk, and in convincing himself that he had miscalculated the pride of the mother of the Sullivans.

Rising in all the majesty of her Irish wrath, "John Sullivan," exclaimed the old lady, "I have hoed potatoes in the field with the Governor of New Hampshire at my breast, the Governor of Massachusetts by my side and the devil tugging at my skirts, but never yet have I allowed one of my sons to be ashamed of me. Order the chaise and send me home."

Remonstrations were of no avail; and home went John Sullivan's mother in all the majesty of her righteous indignation.—Correspondence Washington Star.

WILDE'S IDEA OF AMERICA.

Views of the Æsthete on his Wanderings in the United States.

From a Lecture Reported in London News.

"Stating that he had very little useful information to give, Mr. Wilde described his first experience of the interviewer, "the literary pirate of the states," who sprang on board in the midst of a storm off New York, and asked his opinion of America. Not having seen it, he found it easy to give an unbiassed opinion, which was very favorable as far as it went. Now it was more difficult. The first thing that struck him on landing was the prosperity of the people and the absence of rags. He saw millions of chimneypot hats in all their dreadful proportions, but, no rags. The second thing was that every one seemed to be in a hurry, and this made him think it could not be a country of great romance, for romance was difficult where it was a vital necessity to catch a train. The beautiful he found where the Americans had least striven for it, in their great bridges and their perfectly beautiful use of the electric light.

"The traveling when one got into a Pullman car was the perfection of luxury, but had no more privacy than if one sat in an arm chair at the Hamilton street corner of Piccadilly. Boys ran up and down selling literature, good and bad, and everything one could eat and not eat, but what harrowed his feelings most acutely was to see a pirated copy of his own poems selling for ten cents. He explained to the boy that he got no profit out of this edition of his work, but the boy said he got some, and seemed to think that settled the question. He had never been called "stranger," but had received the title of "captain" and "colonel," the latter in Texas, but he had been very much distressed by being called "professor." Niagara, like the Atlantic ocean, was extremely disappointing, principally, he believed, because it was seen under conditions extremely unfair. In order to apreciate its splendor and strength it was necessary to go under the fall itself in a suit of yellow sealskin so ugly that he never should have consented to wear it but that he was informed that a similar dress had been worn by the great artist, Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. (Laughter.)

"Of America itself the most beautiful part was the west, and California most of all; and the most depressing the alkali plains through which the trains traveled for days, stopping occasionally at small stations, where what, by some curious process of reasoning, was called a meal was served. Here he met the Indians, who were very picturesque and charming as long as they wore their own clothes, and very ugly when they put on European dress. Their language struck him as resembling German metaphysics—very fine as long as it was not understood. (Laughter.) When it was interpreted he generally found it to convey a request for half a dollar or some tobacco. One of the great features of America was the advertiser, who defaced the most beautiful parts of the Rocky Mountains with his advertisements, generally of some horrible medicine. The names of American towns, where they were French or Spanish, were often beautiful, but the English names were very often ugly. He was asked to lecture on art at Griggsville, but he refused unless they consented to change the name of the town, which they declined to do. How dreadful it would have been if he had founded a Griggsville school of art!

"American children did not seem to be numerous, and not as healthy or as joyous as in England, but very precocious. They grow up, some of them, into girls who are the prettiest despots in the world. Each American girl seemed to be an oasis of picturesque unreasonableness in a desert of common sense, able to talk on every subject, whether she knew anything of it or not, with lovely hands and feet, and the prettiest boots in the world. There were no idle men. Every man had something to do, and very few took any interest in politics. One career they went into extensively was journalism, for the first thing a baby did in America when he was able to read and write was to start a newspaper. It seemed strange to English people, their intrusion into private life. He was asked by an interviewer at Chicago for some details of his private life, but he told him he had not got one—It was stopped at the Custom House in New York. Their humor was, he thought, a sort of philosophy, and one thing he admired about the American journalist was that he could write about the price of wool without referring to Jason and the Golden Fleece. The lecturer also referred to the distinguished actors of America, and concluded with some remarks on American art."

The Speed of Yachts.

"There is something beyond calculation in the speed of yachts," said one of John Roach's experts, in talking about Vanderbilt's projected vessel. "Two boats may be built simultaneously from the same model, with every effort to make them precise duplicates as to shape and machinery, and yet one will prove faster than the other. Why this is so no, man can tell. The steamer, Mary Powell has for fifteen years been the swiftest on the Hudson river. During all that time she has never been beaten. Time and again an exact counterpart has been built, with everything copied to a hair, as nearly as the best mechanics and facilities could do it, but none of these have turned out as good as the original. As the reputation of unrivalled speediness is a valuable advertisement for a passenger boat, you can see the object in trying to build a second Mary Powell. Experience has been the same with yachtsmen. They order copies of the swiftest craft, or combine the supposed good points of several and nine times out of ten they are disappointed in the result. Jay Gould did not particularly care for great swiftness, and is not crestfallen because his yacht is easily beaten. He did not contemplate racing, but safe and luxurious sea trips. It is different with Vanderbilt; besides all possible conveniences, he insists on speed. Wheteer he will get it or not remains to be seen. We can only guarantee up to a certain point, and beyond that he must trust to luck. It is possible that a trial trip will be ordered as soon as the machinery is in, so that the boat need not be finished up in case it fails to cut the water satisfactorily. In that case it would probably be devoted to other uses, and another one constructed for Vanderbilt."

A St. Louis firm pays Miss Ella T. Green $1,800 per year to travel for the firm. A furniture house in New York also employs a lady sales-woman for the road.

ALLIGATOR LEATHER.

First Tanned as a Curiosity But Now Used to Make a Multitude of Articles.

From the New York Sun.

A large variety of pocket-books, card-cases, hand bags and other articles made of a peculiar mottled leather was seen in a Chambers-street show-case. A long narrow piece of the same kind of leather hung over them. It was rounded at one end and tapered away to a point at the other. The flippers projected from each side of it.

"The use for alligator skins seems to be increasing," the reporter said to the proprietor of the show-case.

"The increase is astonishing. "Twelve or fifteen years ago alligator leather was tanned as a curiosity. Few articles were made of it. About four years ago, however, the manufacture of alligator leather began in earnest. First a few shoes were made of it, and the manufacturers of such goods saw there was something in it. It is a peculiarly beautiful leather. There are no two skins marked just alike and it follows that no two articles made of the leather can be alike. The natural color of the leather is attractive, set aside from the beauty of the markings. It finishes soft and flexible. It is conceded that Americans tan and finish it in a manner superior to the best workmanship of the old country. Here is a pocketbook; American alligator skin forms the outside; American calfskin the lining. Any judge of such goods will say that it is by all odds the handsomest as well as the best leather of the kind in existance. Sixty dollars a dozen for such goods, small as they are is a low price.

"While the beauty of alligator leather is its chief characteristic, its durability is of hardly less importance. These grip-sacks of alligator leather will outwear their owners, no matter how youthful. With these two things in favor, it is no wonder that the sale of alligator leather is increasing."

"How many alligators were slaughtered to satisfy the demand last year.

"Not less than half a million."

"How do you get the skins and where did they come from?"

"Most of them from Florida and the other Gulf States. The alligators are shot with rifles, and the negroes have almost a monoply of the business. When an alligator crawls out on the sand for his after-dinner sleep he falls a victim. The negro gets from fifty cents to one dollar apiece for alligators. The hunt is carried on so vigorously that the reptiles are beginning to grow scarce. Laws will have to be enacted to protect them during the breeding season and when young.

"All sizes from two to eighteen feet in length are now killed. The choice skin is six feet long. There is as much difference between the six-foot skin and the eighteen-foot skin as there is between a calf skin and an ox hide. The skins are packed in lime for two months to remove the horny scales. The remaining process is much like that for any leather. It takes four months to prepare a skin. There is a tannery for alligator skin in Brooklyn."

"Has any one developed an imitation of alligator leather?"

"The frauds are in using imperfect skins. No lime will soften the horns that have stood the attrition of red-hot sand for half a century. Those skins do not wear well between the scales. There are other inperfections in the skins. The demand for colored goods help us out, however, as the coloring matter covers a multitude of imperfections. When you want an alligator leather article of any kind choose, the uncolored goods, pay a fair price, and you will get the cheapest as well as the handsomest and best."

A Brave Girl.

In the year 1781, while Clinton and Washington were watching each other's movements near New York, Gen. Schuyler, having resigned his command, on account of some unjust charges against him, was staying at his house, which then stood alone outside the stockade or wall of Albany. The British commander, therefore, seeing his opportunity, sent John Walter Meyer, with a party of Tories and Indians, to capture Gen. Schuyler.

When they arrived at the outskirts of the city, they learned from a Dutch laborer that the general's house was guarded by six soldiers. The Dutchman, the minute the band was out of sight, took to his legs and warned the general of their approach.

Soon after, a servant announced that there was a strange man at the back door who wished to see the general.

Schuyler, understanding the trap, gathered his family in one of the upper rooms, and giving orders that the doors and windows be barred, fired a pistol from one of the top-story windows to alarm the neighborhood.

The guards, who had been lounging in the shade of a tree, started to their feet at the sound of the pistol; but alas, too late! for they found themselves surrounded by a crowd of dusky figures, who bound them hand and foot be fore they had time to resist.

And now you can imagine the little group collected in that dark room upstairs; the sturdy general, standing resolutely by the door, with his gun in his hand, and his black slaves gathered around him, each with some weapon; and at the other end of the room, the women huddled together, some weeping, some praying. Suddenly, a crash is heard which chills the very blood, and brings vividly to each one's mind the tales of Indian massacres so common at that day. The band had broken in at one of the windows.

At that moment, Mrs. Schuyler, springing to her feet, rushed toward the door; for she remembered that the baby, only a few months old, having been forgotten in the hurry of flight, was asleep on the first floor. But the general, catching her in his arms, told her that her life was of more value than the child's, and that, if anyone must go, he would. While, however, this generous struggle was going on, their third daughter, gliding past them, was soon at the side of the cradle.

All was as black as night in the hall, except for a small patch of light just at the foot of the stairs. This came from the dining-room, where the Indians could be seen pillaging the shelves, pulling down the china, and quarreling with one another over the ill-gotten booty.

How to get past this spot was the question, but the girl did not hesitate. She reached the cradle unobserved, and was just darting back with her precious burden when, by ill-luck, one of the savages happened to see her. Whiz! went his sharp tomahawk within a few inches of the baby's head, and, cleaving an edge of the brave girl's dress, stuck deep into the stair-rail.

Just then one of the Tories, seeing her flit by, and supposing her to be a servant, called after her: "Wench, wench, where is your master?" She, stopping for a moment, called back, "Gone to alarm the town!" and, hurrying on, was soon safe again with her father-upstairs.

And now very nearly all the plunder having been secured, the band was about to proceed to the real object of the expedition, when the general, raising one of the upper windows, called out in lusty tones, as if commanding a large body of men: "Come on, my brave fellows! Surround the house! Secure the villians who are plundering!" The cowards knew that voice, and they each and every one of them took to the woods as fast as their legs would carry them, leaving the general in possession of the field.

The old Schuyler house looks now as it looked then, except that the back wing for the slaves has been torn down, and some few alterations have been made around the place; but when you are shown the house, you can still see the dent in the stair-rail made by the Indian's hatchet more than a hundred years ago.—George Enos Throop, in St Nicholas for July.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL.

A Beautiful Spot Where Cannon and Shot are Made.

As the name implies, Rock Island arsenal is located on an Island, one of the many thousands the Mississippi guards with its waters. Going down stream, on the right of Iowa side is Davenport, a pleasantly situated little city of some 22,000 people. On the Illinois shore, directly opposite, is the town of Rock Island, but little smaller than Davenport. Like all river towns made by the river, they are, now that the railroads have taken about all the commerce from the boats, frightfully dull, merely holding their own, and will do little better until manufacturing lends aid to start them once again on the way to prosperity and greatness. Early this morning, ere the sun had grown oppressive, a friend and I, armed with passes, obtained through the courtesy of our hotel, started for the island, using the grand iron bridge Uncle Sam has caused us to stretch from shore to shore. Reaching the island and turning up the long stone walk, shady and cool in the early morning air, we presented passes to the guard at the lodge, returned the military salute, and passed through the large iron gates and up to the long boulevard to the gun yards and arsenal proper. All around is a beautiful lawn covered with grand old trees, with charming drives, and everywhere little glimpses of the Mississippi shining through the leaves, making a park hard to rival. After a walk of nearly a mile, we reach one of the many huge stone buildings, and agreeable to orders, having gotten our passes countersigned by the officer of the day, we were at liberty to ramble around. Of course the first object of interest we sought was the gun yards. Imagine if you can an acre of cannon, lying snugly side by side on a sort of an iron bier, so to put it, like dead men, all in rows, like soldiers massed in a solid square with a fence—a wall is better—of cannon balls cunningly piled and surrounding the whole. Here are guns of all kinds, size, and workmanship, some more than a hundred years old. There are "long Toms" whose slimness make their fifteen feet length seem much more to the eye, and every size from that down to the stubby little mortars that look more like an old fashioned churn than anything else. But what interested us most was the "trophies," dozens of cannon captured by our boys in blue in the different wars of our history. Among them were some taken at Saratoga and Yorkton during the revolution, and from Fort Niagara; some old French pieces, taken years ago by the French by their English victors, and thus through the vicissitudes of battle coming to us; there were four brass pieces, twelve pounders, captured from the English at New Orleans, that were cast nearly a hundred years ago for the French commune "La Public Franciase" was the motto graven on their brazen sides, and some further inscription that was too much for my French. But I could not think how they had played their part—a deadly one I daresay, in that cruel French revolution, dragged through the streets of Paris, mayhap, by the frenzied populace and made to deal with death and misery, their grim mouths guarding the guillotine where poor Louis and Mary Antoinette were beheaded, and then they had heard the fickle crowd as it cried, "Vive 'l Empereur," helped earn Napoleon's greatness, boomed for joy when victory sat on his eagles, and lent sad echoes to hills when his star was darkened; they had seen his triumphs, seen his fall for they were at Waterloo, and there left the tricolor for England's bars and crown, and crossing the Atlantic found behind the cotton bales at the crescent city the flag in whose shade they have rested ever since. Farther along in the row some cannon, large ones, captured at Vera Cruz in 1857. And my companion, a gentleman from Kentucky, who served four years on the other side during the late "family jar," laughed pleasantly when we came to a lot of pieces captured at Vicksburg.

The government occupied this island in 1816, Col. Davenport then building a small log fort on the southern end; this was then the far, far western frontier. This fort was maintained until after the Black Hawk war. Then it dwindled to a mere military fort of little moment, during the rebellion it again assumed prominence, being used as a military prison, there being some twenty-five thousand confederate prisoners upon it at one time, and it is the last camping ground for some two thousand yet. Some time in the '60's a commission appointed by the government selected this point for the main and central arsenal of the country, and the entire island was purchased, the state of Illinois relinquishing jurisdiction, and the island is governed the same as the District of Columbia, directly by congress. Since then the government has spent nearly $10,000,000 of money here, and it makes a good showing, for the buildings are many and substantial, being all constructed of yellow limestone, equally devoid of ornament or any superfluous designs that might feed fire or decay. The shops for making war machinery and everything pertaining to war are vast, complete and adapted to their object; the storehouses are perfectly fire proof and well guarded. They cover many acres and to a novice there seems to be guns and amunitions of war enough to kill the whole world. The entire island, which is over two miles long by one wide, and containing some thousand acres, is now occupied by the government. By the erection of a large stone wall, wedge shaped, across the Illinois channel abundant water power is obtained to run the machinery in the shops and for the waterworks. As before mentioned, there are many pretty drives and walks upon the island that are free to all provided with passes only conditioned that holder does not smoke or get on the grass. This is now the only arsenal in the United States, all the others being abandoned. The command consists of colonel, five commissioned officers and fifty regulars. Some twenty-six civilians are employed on guard duty.

The Children In the Snow.

More than half a century ago, in the little valley of Easedale, in Westmoreland dwelt George and Sarah Green, homely, hardworking, pleasant people, with a numerous family of young children.

It was winter time; the snow lay thick upon the ground. A sale of domestic furniture had been announced to take place at the house of some proprietor in Longdale, at a distance from the cottage of the Greens of about five or six miles. It was long past sunset when the auction had concluded, and the time arrived for general separation.

In the Greens' cottage at Easedale, by the side of a peat fire, crouched their six children, waiting for their return. Agnes, the eldest of the family, was nine years old. They depended for bread upon the labors of their parents. Let only a day pass, and they must inevitably be brought to the brink of starvation.

At length Agnes told her brothers and sisters that they must go to bed. They obeyed, but tearfully.

After midnight the snow began to fall. Next morning the ground was very thickly covered. The poor children found themselves completely prisoned. A stream skirting the cottage garden was too wide for them to leap. The wooden bridge crossing it was unsafe. There was no sign of George and Sarah Green.

Gradually, a sense terrible enough, if incomplete, of the awfulness of their situation began to awake in the minds of these poor little ones.

They huddled together the second evening of their being left alone round their hearth-fire of peat, and held a little family council as to what was to be done toward sending help for their parents—for a hope had occurred to them that possibly some hovel or sheep-fold upon the mountain side might be sheltering the missing ones, although they might be snow-bound by the heavy fall of the morning—and, in the next place, to make known their situation to the neighbors, in case the snow should continue, or should increase. For in many days of confinement to the house it was too certain they would perish of starvation.

Meantime the eldest sister, Agnes, though gravely alarmed, exerted herself to take all the measures necessary for the welfare of the little community.

The little girl caused her brothers and sisters to kneel down and say their prayers, and then turned to accomplish every household task that might be of service to them in a long captivity. She took and scalded all the milk she could find in the house so as to save it from turning sour. Then she examined the meal-chest, made some of the common oatmeal porridge of the country; but put all the children, except the two youngest on a short allowance.

Next before night came on, or more snow fell, she went out of doors, and, with the help of the two younger brothers, carried in from the peat-stack as much fuel as might serve them for a week's consumption. She then secured, from the stock of potatoes, buried in withered fern, enough to make a single meal. She was afraid to take more under some idea, that, if removed, they would be spoiled by the heat of the cottage. Then she milked the cow, and succeeded after great exertion, in getting down from a loft above the out house enough food for the animal for one night, at any rate. These tasks accomplished, she re-entered the warm house, barred the door, undressed and put to bed the smaller children, and then sang them to sleep.

The night passed and the morning dawned. More snow had fallen. A second and third day passed, little Agnes consoling her flock, and taking such care for their comfort as she could.

On the fourth day the snow was found to have drifted. Banked up on one side, passages were left exposed on the other. The wooden bridge was still hopelessly impracticable, but, avoiding the brook, it seemed possible that a road might be found into Grasmere. With the assistance of her brothers, Agnes was at last enabled to escape from the cottage, and to gain the pathway into Grasmere.

In such a case the first house she came to was the right one to enter. The news the frightened child brought was sure to secure her a hospitable greeting and the warmest sympathy. Soon it was known throughout the vale that neither George nor Sarah Green had been seen by their children since the day of the sale at Langdalehead. Some sixty men decided upon searching the mountains for the missing ones. They divided themselves into exploring parties, and arranged a plan of communicating with each other by means of signals, in the event of pernous mists rising, or further turns of snow. The men of Grasmere willingly sacrificed their daily earnings to toil without recompense in quest of the unhappy Greens; yet, day after day, the exploring parties returned from a fruitless labor. Every inch of the pathway from Langdale to Easedale had been examined, and a large margin had been investigated on either side of it, yet the traces sought could not be discovered "We'll go up day after day until we find them!" was the sturdy cry.

For some five days the march was ineffectual. Yet there was no flinching from its further prosecution. At length, sagacious dogs were taken up and at noonday a shout was heard high among the mountains amid dense cloudy volumes of cloudy vapor; caught up and repeated by bands and bands of the explorers, the news was conveyed from a distance of several miles, and, as it were telegraphed to Grassmere. The bodies had been found.

George Green had been lying at the bottom of a precipice, from which he had fallen. Sarah Green was found at the summit of the precipice. From the position of the bodies it was conjectured that the husband had desired his wife to pause for a few minutes, wrapping her meanwhile in his own great-coat, while he advanced and sought to reconnoiter. He had probably been blinded by the snow-storm, for the precipice over which he had fallen was but a few yards from the point at which he had evidently quitted his wife.

He had probably died without a struggle; it might be without a groan. It was remembered afterward in Langdalehead that on the night of the sale a furious wind had borne with it the sound of wind-shrieks from the mountains. It was thought that those were the agonizing cries of the poor wife. Her position had been a frightful one. Supposing her husband to have suffered, the sound of his plaints and moans must have reached her ears as she rested above, helpless, cruelly adding to her anguish.

After the funeral a distribution of the children took place among the wealthier families of the neighborhood. The Wordsworth family received one of them into their own household.

On their behalf a subscription list was opened. Queen Charlotte and three of the royal princesses became contributors to the fund, and from the towers of Windsor castle came kind messages of inquiry concerning and expressions of sympathy with the humble orphans of Easedale. Miss Wordsworth published a simple memoir of the unfortunate family, and De Quincey, in his "Recollections of the Lakes," has set forth the story at considerable length."

DREAMY ITALIAN DAYS.

Musings on Como's Cool and Lovely Shores Beneath the Soft and Azure Skies of Sunny Italy.

Modern Italians Abandon Old Religious and Political Creeds for Free Thought and Republicanism.

American Artists in Rome Making Use of the Brains and Skill of Others for Masterpieces.

BELLAGIO, Lake Como, Italy, Special Correspondence, July 20.—I have retreated hither to this mountain region to write my weekly letter—an exercise for which Central Italy is at present rather too warm. Four days of Venice and four of Rome are quite enough at this particular season, even when one does not go entirely for pleasure, but partly in the performance of journalistic duty. I write you to-day from the most picturesque town on the prettiest lake in the world. Bellagio is in the very middle of Lake Como, on the northern point of the fifteen-mile long peninsula that divides the lake in twain. This hotel sits steeply on the hillside, the shore terraced and flower-covered down to the lake in front, and a garden full of bloom and fruitage rising along the slope behind, through olives, orange trees, gigantic aloes, rhododendrons and oleanders grown into trees, and magnolias bearing great blossoms as large as my hat, full of delicious fragrance. The horizon is thick-set with mountains from 5,000 to 12,000 feet high, those to the north covered with snow and bearing icy rivulets suspended on their sides, which glisten in the noonday sun. My north window looks upon these mountains and the lake between which, as the hours pass, turns from blue to a peacock green, from green to purple, according to the varying light and the reflection of the hills. The water-surface is no more changeable or opalescent than that of our Lake George, to which Lake Como is often compared; and, indeed, the two sheets of water have many points of resemblance. Lake George is superior in possession of a hundred islands, an element of beauty which Como wholly lacks; but the cliffs here are far higher and more precipitous, sometimes overhanging the water up a sheer acclivity of three or four thousand feet, and the torch of fire and the moulding fingers of storm have been here, supplemented by the skillful hand of man, till every mountain scar seems masked with vines, every tottering crag stayed by a pretty arch, and every hoyden rivulet turned into a creature of grace and loveliness. Nature unadorned, spite of the poet, is often very ugly. I am sure that the sight of these Alpine peaks around, with glacier-brooks caught in their descent and hung aloft like jewelry, with tired clouds resting in the hollows half way down, and little white villages here and there, and invisible shepherds tending invisible cattle, and churches hanging over cliffs without any obvious congregation, and vineyards trailing lower still, and the dainty manipulation of art and culture everywhere along the shore, revealing gardens, orchards, mounting terraces, rustic bridges, romantic viaducts, mimic bastions, turrets and towers—I am sure this is superior to the majestic but still barbarous framing of America's most beautiful lake. There are not many people at Bellagio now, the season being April, May and June, September, October and November. But we do not find it very warm, and the lakes are "all that can be desired." A lady of our party is badly mashed on the subject of mountains. She insists on a constant diet of mountains; in this respect she is a P. I. G.—perfectly insatiable girl. When she gets home she will insist on having a mountain (a volcano, if possible) to set in the front yard. Coming through the Mt. Cenis pass she stood up almost all the way for nine hours and rhapsodized about the snow-capped mountains that flanked the way. Any suggestion that she sit down and rest was resented as flat blasphemy. So we shall stay here for a week and take one lofty range for a daily ration and an extra peak (through a field glass) for lunch.

ART AND RELIGION IN ROME.

There is not much new to write you about the ruins of Rome—which is not so superfluous a sentence as it first appears. More than half of the classic ruins have been disclosed to view within the last twenty-five years, when Napoleon III. seriously began the work of excavation. Since his dethronement it has been carried forward languidly, and at present the remainder of the Roman forum is being uncovered at the rate of half an acre a year. A few good statues have been found this year, but nothing of primary importance and little that will be used to illustrate the progress of art. Rome is the center of the study of sculpture, as Paris is of painting. There are here more than 2,000 artists and students of art, from all quarters of the globe. There is one student here from Patagonia; several from Japan and China and the Sandwich and Society islands. There are eight or ten Americans—none of them students, I am afraid, all of them professors and practitioners. People of other nationalities come to Rome to study; Americans generally come to go to work and "sculp" at once. An artist told me:

"I have never known but two Americans, beside myself, who came here and honestly went to studying. They generally come and set up a studio the first thing; take a few lessons of some impecunious Italian, get some clay, and go to work—fishing for orders. If they get a commission, good luck! They then hire an artist, generally an Italian, to make a model for them, and then hire workmen to make the statue. I can mention half a dozen artists whose names stand high in America, who got their reputations on work conceived and executed almost wholly by Italians, and I know some of the men who did the work. Rogers has always made his own models, I believe; so has Mrs. Phinney, who received severe training in our schools here; so has Bartlett. But a majority of the American sculptors have been pretenders, when for thirty francs a year for tuition they might have thoroughly qualified themselves by a full course in the Royal Institute."

"Religions?" he continued in reply to my question, "No; no men in Italy are religious excepting the priests and some of the peasants. I mean what I say—almost literally none. I know scores of artists, lawyers, doctors, educated men, hundreds, perhaps, and I do not remember one single religious man among them all. There is, of course, now and then a religious man here who is not absolutely illiterate, but he is regarded with astonishment, if not with scorn. I heard two young artists yesterday talk about a companion. 'There's Fizzacio,' said one, 'a bright fellow, a fair artist, enlightened and respected—what can we hope for Italy when such a man as he is goes to church, to prayer, and even to confession?' This shows the feeling. The better class of Italians—that is, the educated and the propertyholders—say 'the church is for women and children, a thing for the weak and timid, and for lawbreakers, but we will have none of it.' So, though technically Catholics, because born into the church, they neglect all its rites, defy its penalties, and call its priests and monks 'baggarozzi'—that is, cockroaches. In France they go by the kindred name of 'black slugs,' because they do no good and yet help eat the crops.

"Politics? Well, the men who hate the priests hate also the kings and nobles. Skeptics to the church are also skeptics to royalty. They class the soldiers with the priests—as the lazy devourers of the substance of the working people. These are Republicans, and the Republican party is constantly growing all over Italy. The wisest of the party see that the hour has not yet come; that the peasants are too dull-witted to see their own interests at once; and Humbert and Marguerite are prudent and modest. But it is the general opinion of Republicans in Italy that Humbert will never have a successor. I say I do not know a religious man among my friends, and it follows, of course, that I scarcely know a Royalist. The educated men are alike unbelievers in priests and kings."

I met several of various nationalities who told me the same thing. The fact is, that when these diverse states came together as "United Italy" there was one question which even favor was not wise enough to solve. Every one of the large cities insisted on being the capital of Italy—Rome, Naples, Florence, Bologna, Venice, Verona, Genoa, Milan, Turin. Each had a Palazzo Reale all ready for the illustrious guest, each five times as large and expensive as the White House at Washington. Victor Emmanuel temporized. He boarded around for a while, giving a month or two of each year to each palace. But it made exactly the same trouble it always makes when the school ma'am boards around—one was jealous of the other. Finally Humbert concluded to spend most of his time in Rome, but to visit each of the other palaces for an indefinite time during each year. The result of this is that there are eight or ten royal palaces to be swept out and holystoned every morning, furnished sumptuously and kept in order, and the only income is the 20 or 30 francs a day which each palace receives from curious travelers. The cost is tremendous—probably forty times as great as supporting the president of the United States and his whole establishment. This causes a great deal of grumbling and makes republicans by the wholesale. People who pay taxes—that is everybody—continually ask, To what good? Since that paragraph was begun a startling hailstorm has swept up the lake—a sharp clatter on the roof and windows of ice stones as large as the individual salts or butter dishes which I remember having seen in use at American hotels, and shaped into curiously molded forms. It strowed the ground with leaves and blossoms, broke off great branches here and there, crashed in windows on the south end of the hotel and shattered many of the gas lamps along the terraces. The tumult has stirred up the garden's fragrance anew. The pomegranate and fig trees that lift their treasures to my balcony seem to have borrowed the odor of the white cape jasmine and magnolia that the storm has beaten down; and even that vegetable porcupine, the fan palm, that menaces me at the window, has found in the general worriment a breath of balsam it never had before. The lake is tossed into mimic fury, and the clouds are rising and revealing the snow peaks again. Well, the storm has quite passed. Big-eyed children have ceased to gather hailstones. All is serene again. The clouds have sailed north, and Bernini stands white and superb against the sky. The pomegranate blossom looks more fiery than ever. The porcupine on a stick at my window seems gathering himself for some fresh attack. The church that sits like a monk in an inaccessible nook, 2,000 feet up the side of the mountain, seems whiter and lonelier than ever, perched in the very track of the avalanche that clings to the cliffs above, as if meditating a plunge into the still palpitating lake.

SOME UNHAPPY AMERICANS.

A large proportion of Americans in Europe are unhappy—half of them, I estimate, though the fraction may be too large. There are thousands of Americans traveling here who have no business here; whom Europe has nothing to offer; who would be vastly better off at home. I meet them every week in couples and processions. They are (usually) uneducated and vulgar, who came to Europe merely because they have, by nip and tuck, earned money enough to come, and it is the thing to do. They are the Peter Bell sort of folks, to whom a primrose or a mountain is nothing to speak of—and nothing to think of. They never see a cloud—unless to remark that it is going to rain. To them all rivers and lakes are alike—except in size—and mountains are simply blemishes on the landscape, impediments to be got through or over as soon as possible. People without sentiment have no business to be here—or anywhere else except right at home, counting their money and grubbing for more. I met a specimen of these yesterday who has got rich making brass buttons in Connecticut. He grumbles at everything he sees—actually fights his way from town to town. He cares nothing for nature, so of course he cares nothing for art—cares for nothing except to "see Europe" and get home. I pity him. And I pity his wife, who is as poverty-stricken as he is. And I pity the Europeans who encounter either of them. Buttons pere hired a courier till he found out that the courier cheated him—as they all do—then he let him go, and has a time of it settling alone. He grumbles because they charge for transporting his baggage, and gets profanely eloquent over the item of "soap and candles 2 francs extra." He declines to offer the slight income of "pour boore," and when the porter or head waiter pleasantly says, on his departure, "bon jour" or "buon georno," or "guten tag," and frankly holds out his hand for the expected pence, Buttons denounces him as a swindler and a beggar in fairly good English, and wishes he was out of this rascally country. In short, Mr. Buttons refuses to conform gracefully to the habits of the people among whom he travels. He swears every time he has his baggage weighed and registered, and calls in a loud voice for "a check."

"Does it cost you more here than at home?" I asked him yesterday.

"More!" he exclaimed, in surprise. "Not more than two-thirds as much."

"Then why do you complain of it all the while?"

"Because their way is so uncivilized. It ain't the money that makes me mad—it's the clumsiness. The idea of charging me 10 cents for that little bit of soap. It is mean and niggardly."

He is resolved to reform the country at once, and make its methods agree with those of the United States. It is a large contract he has taken, and the measure of his success is not worth the fret and worry it costs.

"See here!" he called out at dinner to the head-waiter, who spoke English; "I've ordered some ice; you going to charge me for it?"

"Yes; it is our custom to charge four sous for ice specially ordered."

"What for? Don't it come right on the side of the bill here, lots of it?"

"Yes; so do mushrooms, but we have to gather them."

"Well, why don't you put it into the general bill?"

"Because few people want it."

"Very well, you needn't get me any; I won't have it."

Of course some of Button's suggestions are good ones, but his method is bad. Our American check system is the best; no doubt of it. Ice ought to be included in the general bill, and most of the hotels have already adopted that change. But the way to get along in Europe and be comfortable is to fall in with the requirements of the locality, and spend the strength on sight seeing instead of on fretting and invective. People who wish to live exactly as they do at home had better stay there.

July 21.—Morning—The storm has left the air cool and clear. Blankets were needed last night. The lake is rough again. It seems to be October, except for the bright green vegetation everywhere. The churches and convents in the nooks of the height behind Menaggio are wonderfully distinct; village rises above village, and even the broken walls of old castles stand out on the cliffs. At the water's edge Villa Carlotta sleeps amid its vines. In the distance Mount Legnone shines high and white, and seems to be only an hour's walk away. This is a fascinating spot; but to-morrow I turn north again and traverse the St. Gothard pass into Central Switzerland. W. A. CROFFUT.

TWO NYMPHS.

When turns the year a crescent face
  Upon the world as Spring draws nigh,
And roses o'er the morning slopes,
  And stirs the depth of dewy sky,
Floats a form of phantom grace
  Along the shores, before the breeze;
And from her boat full many a note
  She breathes along the morning seas,
  While clouds of swallows, blithe with youth,
  In the mild light sail up the south,
  Calm mountains flecked with rainy green
  Above the wheaten plains are seen,
  Slowly the rivulet's bubbles pass
  Through rain-scattered blades of sun-warm grass;
  The oak-wreath on the altar lies,
With milk and honey, cake and wine;
  And hamlet folk beneath its smoke,
  Whose pillar bluely soars the skies,
  With gladsome feet and carols sweet
Circling, praise the Spring divine.
When Autumn's yellow leagues of shores,
  And quiet sultry harvest time—
In fields through which the sickle scores,
  And crimsoning orchards—nears its prime,
Comes a nymph out of the wood,
  Where amber glories sift and cross,
  And apples sleep on golden moss;
Whose cheek, flushed dark with deep sunned blood,
  Glows, pacing down beneath a crown
  Of wall flowers streaked with yellow and brown;
  Eyed like Arabia's twilight rolled
  In garments rich as Ganges' gold;
  Still seen where broods the slumbrous ray;
  Until the broad sun down the bay
  Has dipped in chasms of cooling day;
Then floats on mellow wind afar,
  To sleep in glimmering roofted cave
  Beside the long luxurious wave,
Beside her dusk and splendid star.

A REVOLUTION IN JUDAISM.

The Tendency of Hebrews in This Country to Lose Their Identity as a Peculiar People, and to Become Americanized.

Sights and Scenes at Long Branch, Where the Wealthy Jew Plays No Unimportant Part as a Social Factor.

A Project to Perpetuate the Teachings of Infidel Bennett by Carving Them in Immortal Marble at Greenwood Cemetery.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Aug. 2.—The Jews will become before long so absorbed by the rest of the people in America as to be indistinguishable. Prof. Felix Adler says so, and there is no more observant or intelligent Jew in the country than he. But he is an apostate, and a strictly orthodox Hebrew would scout the idea of Israel ever losing her separate character. But there is no denying that the more educated and more prosperous Israelites in this city are drifting far away from their ancient standards. While still measurably apart from Christians in social life, they are necessarily mixed with them in business, and here the line of distinction is unquestionably being obliterated. Go through the streets of wholesale trade, and you will be struck, first, by the preponderating Jewish names on the signboards; and, second, you will observe that a surprising number of firms are apparently composed of Jews and Christians. This is slightly more so in appearance than in reality, for Jews have developed a tendency to Americanize their names. For instance, a Mr. Sandheim lately became Mr. Sands. Or failing in business and starting anew, he concluded it wise to begin with a freshened name. Instances of this sort are numerous, so that a firm name showing in part a lack of Judaism does not mean a copartnership with Christianity. Nevertheless, the repugnance to close business relationship has considerably given way on both sides, and they no longer come together in trade exclusively for mutual spoiliation. In religion, of course, there is no meeting half way, for the Christian most tolerant in mercantile affairs entertains no notion of becoming a Jew, and that is just the way the Jew feels regarding Christianity. But they can and do get together irreligiously; that is to say, on the plane of infidelity. I prefer not to go into a ticklish subject far enough to estimate the proportion of our business men who are unbelievers in any sort of revealed religion, but it is safe to say that Jews in New York with an income of a thousand a year and upward have generally departed from the faith of their fathers. Thousands have renounced all allegiance, and never go into a synagogue to worship. Other thousands remain nominal members of congregations, but freely eat unclean food, work on Saturdays, and observe few of the rites and usages of the ten tribes; and indeed it is only the Polish Jew, in the crowded East Side tenement colonies of his people who strictly maintains Judaism in the metropolis.

THE JEW AT THE BEACH.

Long Branch is the best place to see the social aspects of the moneyed Jew. In the city he is the greatest of theater-goers, and can be found at the fashionable public balls; but much of his social diversion is out of the sight of the rest of us. But down at the seashore he is in full view, both as a cottager and as a hotel guest. Judge Hilton, whose order excluding Jews from the Grand Union, Saratoga caused such a stir a few years ago, has an extensive enterprise founded here on the same principle. His Hilton park, which is to contain a large number of cottages, will be wholly free from Jews. But there is no landlord along the Jersey shore who maintains this rule, though several manage to keep Israel in a very small minority. The largest and most fashionable house is at least one-third filled by Jews, and its concededly best dressed lady is Mrs. Fraley, wife of a Jewish banker of St. Louis. The most prejudiced critic could find no impoliteness in her manners, while her wardrobe commands wondering admiration by its extent and richness, but gives no offense by any lack of good taste. The two ladies who stand next in toilet distinction are Mrs. Loeb and Miss Hass, sisters of Jewish birth, but Episcopalians in religion. Indeed, this hotel presents more social indications than I have seen elsewhere that Adler's prophecy of eventual absorption may prove true. But he will have to wait awhile—say 100 years or so—for its entire fulfillment. Who would suppose that the careful, methodical, thrifty Jew would ever gamble? And yet the heaviest loser whom I have heard of in the gorgeous hells of the Branch this season is an Israelite. He is a stock farmer, however, and his business is next door to professional gambling. He dropped into Charley Ransom's club house one night this week, and in a few hours left $9,000 on the faro table. Speaking of religion, Long Branch knows no Sabbath. There are churches especially for the summer visitors, it is true, but not one holds a congregation equal in numbers to the Sunday bathers at any of the many hotels, and on Sunday afternoons the drives are as full of equipages as on a week day.

REAL STROLLING PLAYERS.

In theatricals I yesterday saw a genuine company of strolling players. There were four members—a man, a woman, a child and a dog. They were traveling along the Jersey shore in a tour of the summer resorts; and they were not afoot because bad business had reduced them to that inexpensive mode of going, but in pursuance of their habit. The man was a versatile comedian, with several dialects at his command, and the scenery and costumes on his shoulders in the shape of a Punch and Judy show and its puppets. The woman looked out for what showmen call the "front of the house." She was also the orchestra, for she played the tambourine in which she gathered coin. The child was an infant phenomenon, probably capable at times of dancing nimbly, though when I saw her fatigue had taken all the skip out of her little legs. The dog was a rare performer of tricks. Such were their respective duties in the entertainment. As viewed in transit, the child was carried in a basket on the back of the woman and the dog drew a cart load of baggage.

"That is what I call a nice, compact working party," said Frank Chanfran, the actor, as he watched them setting up their show on his lawn. "All in the family; everybody with plenty to do, no salaries to pay or sharing terms to haggle over, and no costly transportation to eat into the receipts."

Nor any board bills, for I subsequently saw them encamped by a roadside. A tree had been their hotel for the night, and a cursory glance at their breakfast made it appear to be composed of gratuitous bits from a kitchen and surreptitious vegetables from unguarded fields. From the wag of the dog's tale to the laughter of the child there were no indications of anything but amiable comfort in these lawless vagabonds.

Nevertheless, their summer outing looked incongruous when it took them through the luxurious life which now fills Long Branch. Good clothes are so common there that threadbareness seems misery and rags absolute agony. An observant woman tells me that the dressing has never been richer, as displayed evenings in the larger hotels. It is true that dullness in trade and speculation has brought a great many men round to the summer season without money enough to spare for the more fashionable watering place visits, and that their families have therefore found a sudden appreciation of the delights of mountain air; but the women who are here betray no dimunition of wardrobe resources. Readers belonging to the gown-wearing sex may care to know that white and light colors are worn exclusively, except on cool or rainy days; that the decorations are lace and embroideries in lavish quantities; that hats and elaborate hair dressing are scarce in contrast with what was usual a few years ago; that bodices are invariably cut low, though more or less filled in with lace, and that the manners of the wearers present the looked for range from good to bad. There is not much left, however, of those peculiarly offensive airs which for a decade after the war were characteristic of what we termed our "shoddy aristocracy." There is loudness enough in all conscience, but the vulgarity is pretty evenly distributed among those who have grown quickly rich and those who were born so. When the burly young Briton whom some of the young women in my hotel admire because he is "so agreeably English, you know," eats like a boor at my side, and climaxes his dinner offenses by filling his mouth with water, rinsing his teeth, and then spitting it all out into his napkin, I may reasonably forego for Americans any claim of monopoly in vulgarity. And my disgust faded into a smile when I saw him gaze, with manifest amazement and disapproval, at a woman whose method of feeding herself consisted of using her fork only to pile an assortment of viands on her knife, and the blade to convey these variegated mouthfuls out of sight. He should have forgiven her that eccentricity, which was cleanly and polite compared with his own, for it was her industriously blithsome daughter who conveyed to me a favorable regard of his Englishism. She talks with an acquired London accent. "Me cawt me cawt, at 5 o'clock," she said to the family coachman, in a voice loud enough for a verandah full of people to hear. "Caught what, Miss?" the man inquired. A repetition of the order did not make him understand it, and she had to say in plain American pronunciation, though she lowered her voice and stepped closer in doing so, "My cart, stupid; my village cart at 5 o'clock."

It is interesting to look back of the finery which wealth has put on the backs of the women to see how the money has been obtained.

"Do you see that lady in the white Ottoman silk?" said a friend.

"The one with the shapely figure?" I responded.

"Yes, that's the one; but her shape always seems to me like a certain bottle of stomach bitters. Why? Because her father's fortune came from the manufacture of a constituent of cocktails. Over yonder in dainty mull is the wife of a face powder; going down the hallway are the two daughters of a soothing syrup; and the swell, who drove past a few minutes ago in a dog cart tandem, was a son of a pill."

About the most amusing product of wealth at the Branch is the young man whose tastes have run ahead of the money allowance which a sensible father accords him. He could drive one horse without extravagance, but his desires extend to a pair; one good room would lodge him comfortably, but he likes to lounge in two; and so he goes, making himself miserable when he might be happy. Why does this bring him misery? Because he could pay his bills if he didn't make a fool of himself; but, as it is, creditors hound him at every turn. He came down to the seashore with his hair cut very short, and bleached from its natural red to a light blonde. This had been done for improvement, and so it was rudely unjust for a familiar acquaintance to cry out to him: "It isn't any disguise, old chap. They'll know you in a minute."

AN INFIDEL'S MONUMENT.

I predict that the infidels will soon have a grievance, real or fancied, just as one chooses to regard it, but one which even the eloquent Ingersoll will think it worth while to talk about. D. M. Bennett called himself a free thinker, while others deemed him a crank. He did not stop with plain disbelief of Christianity, but rode wild hobbies of socialism, even to the dirty lengths of free love. He edited a paper called the Truthseeker, was a favorite speaker at wild people's meetings, and at length became in their eyes a martyr by serving a term in the penitentiary for publishing an obscene book. On his liberation, he appeared on the platform of Cooper Institute hall in the dress of a convict, and was greeted by 4,000 followers with tremendous enthusiasm. His journal, which had been comparatively unknown, now gained circulation by means of this incidental advertising, its editor came into demand as a lecturer, and his assaults upon religion seemed at last to have struck remuneration, when sudden death shut him off from that reward. Bennett's followers were asked to contribute to a monument fund, and I learned from his widow that they have given over $1,000. She says he is buried in Greenwood cemetery, in a lot owned by her brother. The ground, all graded and railed, has thus been provided, leaving only the monument itself to be erected by subscriptions, and she depends on these reaching a total of $1,400. She has made a contract with an old friend and warm supporter of Bennett's and who therefore has conceded a low price for the work, so that about a $2,000 granite pile is contemplated. The design comprises a massive base surmounted by a column, altogether reaching a height of about fifteen feet. Near the top of the front face will be a bronze medallion portrait of Bennett two feet in circumference, and under it a record of his name, birth and death. It is on the remaining three sides, however, that the trouble which I anticipate will be lettered.

"Here will be engraved," says Mrs. Bennett, "extracts from my husband's works—glowing truths uttered by himself, and which are the best monument he could have. They will tell to coming generations what manner of man he was, and long after the shaft shall have crumbled they will live in the memories of those who learned them from its face."

Such is the fond expectation of the widow, and it may possibly be realized, but I think not in Greenwood cemetery. The quotations selected to be inscribed are violently denunciatory of Christianity, and Greenwood is a Christian burial ground, whose authorities will not permit the diversion of sacred ground to such a use. Then the infidels will make an uproar, see if they don't.

A BARGAIN IN CHARITY.

Down in John street, close by the first Methodist church ever built in America, a Christian firm of merchants are doing something beneficent that cannot give rise to any controversy. In the cellar of their store they have coiled 200 feet of pipe in a barrel and put that in a hogshead, the space between the two receptacles being filled with sawdust, while the coil is kept packed in ice, which chills the water running through the pipe. The latter is extended upstairs and through the side of the house to the street, where the cooling beverage is on tap free to everybody. The original investment in this charity was less than $100, and to keep it going about $5 a week is expended.

"That's a downright bargain in charity," said its originator, as he stood watching the drinkers.

"How many of them do you suppose are grateful?" I asked.

"I don't know," he replied, "and I don't much care, for we get a good deal of satisfaction out of the sight, anyhow. But I guess they have more appreciation than you seem to think, or else they would break or carry off the tumblers. We put out a tin cup at first, and fastened it to a chain; but it looked so mean, so much like a dog trough, that we took it away and put up the shelf as you see it, with four glasses. Thus far this summer only two glasses have been stolen, five broken, and our porter has a theory that the beer saloon folks over yonder did the breaking maliciously."

Edison at the Key.

"Edison used to work the other end of a circuit with me," says a telegraph operator interviewed in the Vicksburg Herald, "and I knew him when he was in Memphis some thirteen or fourteen years ago. He always looked ratty, and never spent his money on clothes, but the reason was that he was always tinkering with some new contrivance or other, and spent his money for material to work out his inventions. He used to take press in Memphis. He was as fast as they could make 'em, and his copy never gave a telegraph editor a bit of trouble. He had a way while waiting for copy of drawing caricatures, illustrating the character of news he was getting and putting them along in the spaces of the copy he sent in to the press. This made one of the papers up there, I forgot which, red hot, and it opened up on him, and had a good deal to do with his being fired by the manager. Edison didn't want the fool editor to print his funny pictures in his telegraphic news. He only drew them for his own amusement. When he went to Boston, with his yellow breeches on in the middle of winter, the manager of the office, finding he was an expert, hired him to keep the repeaters in order. Edison worked at the instruments a part of two days, and then was caught by the manager of the office fooling with some new contrivance of his own. 'Thought I hired you to keep those repeaters in order,' said the manager. 'You did,' said Edison, 'but I've put a kink or two into them that will make them keep themselves in order.' From that day his fortune was made."

RINALDO AND THE GIANT.

The giant, amid thousand strokes, at last
On the knight's forehead dealt one mighty blow,
Just as his courser spurring forward fast,
Rinaldo came to work him shame and woe.
Like to Typhœus' neath the mountain vast,
He all but sank, by weighty steal laid low;
While, like to night obscure the world o'ershading,
Came mists and darkness dim his eyes invading.

Yet soon his limbs their strength, his eyes their sight
Regained, its wonted courage too his heart;
Such evil chance made sad at soul the knight,
And bade his breast with wrath fresh kindled smart;
So much the more as Clarice's cheeks turned white
He saw, her eyes made dim by tears that start;
Hence struck he so the wounded that, though un-wounded,
His every bone felt by the pain confounded.

Fearing his cruel death, her own disgrace,
Clarice stands gazing on her lover dear,
And as she views his combat's changeful case,
So change her look and heart from hope to fear;
Now deadly pallor covers all her face,
Now colors bright and roseate there appear,
Like as, white frosts keep from the spring retreat-
  ing,
March skies show gleams of light and dark clouds fleeting.

DEAD AND LIVING SPORTS.

The Tragic Fate of the Rash Swimmer Excites Sympathy at the Hub and Brings Up Old Reminiscences.

The Palatial Gin Mill Where Slugger Sullivan Will Deal Out Drinks to Boston's Thirsty Throats.

BOSTON, Mass., Special Correspondence, Aug. 1.—The Dolly D. has now been at her moorings nearly a week, and the jolly yachting party that cruised in her during the past few weeks has broken up, its members, perhaps, to meet later in the year and again skim over the waters along the picturesque New England coast. After experiencing the various temperatures of a good many of the popular seaside resorts in this vicinity, I could not help remarking, on returning to the Hub, upon the comparative coolness of the city over a number of the watering places. In my judgment, it has been much warmer, on the average, this summer, in one-half the beach cities than it has in Boston; and yet deluded cool-air seekers are contentedly paying $3 and $4 a day for poor accommodations at seaside hotels, and are flattering themselves that they are getting iced atmosphere on the half-shelf, compared to that which their less fortunate, or less foolish, brethren are breathing in the city. I find that the principal topic of conversation is Capt. Webb and his terrible death; that interest in the telegraphers' strike is rapidly dying out, and that the greatest event now looked forward to by bibulous Bostonians is the opening of Slugger Sullivan's saloon. When Capt. Webb first announced his intention of swimming the falls, few thought that he really meant to do it, except perhaps his most intimate friends. So little interest was manifested in the proposed feat that the public had almost forgotten it when the news arrived that the bold swimmer had met his death in attempting to accomplish it. Then it was not believed that the captain was so foolhardy, and many thought that a dummy of some kind had been substituted, and that the captain would turn up again in a few days scratched and torn and half dead from supposed exhaustion. This, it was thought, would be done as an advertisement, as the captain was about to make a professional tour of the watering places and large interior cities. It was remembered that four years ago the captain and Paul Boyton, the rubber suit natator, were matched for $2,000 to swim at Nantucket, just off the beach, Webb to swim ten miles, while Boyton was to paddle twelve and a half miles. The race was not started until late in the afternoon, and by the time it was dark Webb had become confident that unless he did something desperate he was a beaten man. He swam to the shore and ran along the beach as fast as he could in the direction of the judge's boat. Passing Boynton and thinking himself unseen in the darkness he rushed into the water again and swam to the boat. Before reaching it, however, Boyton, by quick work, came in first, greatly surprised that his rival was so near, as he had for a long time been far ahead of him. An investigation followed, and the fact that Webb ran a good part of the distance on shore was well established. The stake money was never paid, and for a long time Webb and his undertakings were looked upon by the public with suspicion. Judging from this, many thought the swimming of the falls a "skin," but now all doubt is dispelled, and only expressions of sorrow at his untimely death are heard.

WEBB IN BOSTON.

Capt. Webb was widely known in this vicinity through the many exhibitions given by him. He was very pleasant, quiet and gentlemanly, and there was nothing of the "blawsted, blowing Britisher" about him. A year ago last spring he attracted considerable public notice in this city by his wonderful feats of endurance in the water. A large room was hired by his manager, Fred Kyle, on Tremont street, and a large tank built in it, which was filled with fresh water "loaded" with salt. The salt was put in the water in order to make it heavier, and so that the swimmer would be better sustained and supported by it. In this he floated constantly for five days and four nights, coming out but five minutes in every twenty-four hours. At the end of that time he was seized with cramps and was out of the water a full half-hour. He went back again, however, and finished out the week. When the captain desired to sleep, he put his hands under his head and clenched them together with his fingers. In this manner he would float and sleep until his fingers would relapse their hold and allow his head to slowly sink beneath the water, when he would awake and try it over again. He would thus get fifteen-minute naps. A short time after this he essayed to remain in the water a month, night and day. Before the first week had expired he began to grow weak and loose flesh, but he persisted in his attempt. At last he grew so terribly weak that a few days before the month was up his physician ordered him out of the water to save his life. The remains of the unfortunate man are expected to arrive in this city to-morrow, and funeral services will be held at Hull, Mass., the day following. Capt. Webb once remarked to his wife Madelaine, that if he he wished to be buried in the little old cemetery at Hull, close by the sea he loved so well. This quiet burial place is located upon the southeast slope of Telegraph Hill, Hull, and is observable miles from shore by the noble trees which surround it. There are many memorial slabs within it for those who have perished at sea, and a few monuments. The cemetery has been in use nearly 200 years, but now few are buried in it. At one time there were a number of ancient monuments there, but tradition states that the French troops, quartered on the peninsular away back in the last century, carried them down to the water side and utilized them for wash boards.

A subscription list has been opened in this city for Mrs. Webb and her children, and no doubt a snug little sum will be secured and presented to her.

SLUGGER SULLIVAN.

I fell in with Frank Moran, John L. Sullivan's manager, yesterday, and was invited to inspect the elegant gin mill which the champion of the American prize ring has had fitted up for him. It is located on Washington street, near Eliot, quite near the favorite haunts of the lesser stars of the prize ring, and is numbered 714. It has not yet been opened to public inspection, and close guard has been kept upon the doors to prevent over-inquisitive persons from gaining admission, as the champion desires to surprise and overcome Bostonians with the magnificence of his saloon upon the evening of Aug. 7 or 8. It is almost entirely finished, and will be ready for business at the appointed date. Sullivan has been exceedingly lavish in his expenditure in fitting up his drinking palace, and I fear he has put more money into it than he will draw out. In the opinion of competent judges it is equal in elegance to the famous bar-room of Ned Stokes in New York. There are not so many costly works of art, but the carving and wood work is much more lavish. Outside there is nothing particularly attractive. It is tastily painted, and above, running the whole width of the saloon, is a plain black sign board, on which, in gilt letters, is the name of the owner, John L. Sullivan. Handsome shades with Sullivan's monogram finely painted upon them and with artistic borders, protect the large panes of glass when desired, but during business hours these are to be kept up and through the windows the whole interior can be seen from the outside. The saloon might be called a marvel in mahogany, for there is not a piece of wood in it of any other kind than that. The door leading into this throne room of King Alcohol is a double one of solid mahogany, with engraved glass panels. Upon both window seats Sullivan's full name is inlaid with costly mother-of-pearl on glass veneer in imitation of Russian marble, and these alone will prove objects of great interest to visitors. The whole interior is one blaze of red, through which can be seen the variegated colors reflected from the beautiful glass veneer, inlaid mosaic style in the ceiling. The walls are tinted in pink, and are not hung with works of art of any description save in one place, on the left in the rear, where a magnificent painting, some 20x10 feet, and which is valued at $30,000, is hung. On the left as you enter is Sullivan's private room, which is quite large and tastily fitted up with the finest furniture of mahogany, made specially to order. There is a desk and a wonderfully-carved table, besides chairs and a lounge. The carpet upon the floor is the very best that could be procured, and cost $8 a yard. To the right is the cigar counter, also of the best polished mahogany, and carved. Directly behind it upon the wall is a large case, reaching almost to the ceiling, with a dozen or more compartments for the goods. This case is exquisitely carved throughout. Next comes the bar, over which the liquid refreshments are to be served. This is thirty feet in length, of solid polished mahogany, guarded by a round railing of the same wood. The front face is divided at intervals of five feet by half columns, upon which are carved the busts and heads of Venus. These figures are finely executed, a week being given by the carver to each one. Carved in the center of this face are Sullivan's initials, while in various other parts it is ornamented by the chisel and mallet. Behind the bar are three monster mirrors of the very best make, set into a framework of elaborately carved and finely polished mahogany. These glasses are the largest in Boston, and are valued at $1,100. The center one is the largest of the trio and measures ten feet by seven feet, and is guarded on both sides by massive columns of wood elaborately carved. The glass is crowned by the life-sized bust of Sullivan, carved out of solid wood. This is a wonderfully well executed work, and took the artist over six months to complete it. The mirrors on either side of the center are nine feet by six feet, and are perfect pieces of plate glass. At the extreme end of the room is a mammoth refrigerator and wine holder, also of solid mahogany, which reaches nearly to the ceiling. This is carved to correspond with that upon the other woodwork, and its glass face is guarded by a brass railing. On either side of it is a mirror ten feet by eight feet, also protected by a brass railing. On the wall directly to the left hangs the painting before spoken of, and between that and Sullivan's private room are the lavatories and sanitary of solid mahogany in every part. The fixtures and work put into this gorgeous groggery alone have cost the noted knight of the knuckles $20,000. The bar is arranged for the accommodation of four drink mixers, one of whom is to be Sullivan's brother. The glassware used is the best that could be obtained, and was specially imported for the owner. Each piece is engraved with the letter "S." The wine cellar is filled with barrels, boxes, cases, etc., from bottom to top, the stock being of the very best and valued at about $8,000. The saloon itself is one of the sights of the city. There is nothing gaudy about it, and good taste has been exhibited in every part. It is lighted from the ceiling with two costly chandeliers of hammered silver and polished brass. They were specially designed for Sullivan, and can be turned in any direction. The lights are shaded by globes, tinted in old gold color. Behind the bar are six brackets of the same design as the chandeliers. Altogether there are forty-five lights in the saloon, whose rays are doubly reflected by the polished mahogany below, and the colored glass veneering above. When all are lighted the scene is most dazzlingly beautiful. Frank Moran is to have the active charge of the business, while Sullivan is to be the attraction to draw trade. Some difficulty was experienced at first in securing a license, as the shopkeepers in the immediate vicinity of the saloon objected, but these were hushed up with money, and with the help of the eminent slugger's influence the license was at last granted.

THE COMING MILL.

Sullivan is now in training for his match with Slade, the Maori, at Madison square garden, New York, next Monday night, at the Cliffs, Scituate, Mass. I asked Moran how the champion was progressing.

"He is in fine condition," said the valiant Frank. "I left him this morning in the hands of Joe Goss and Pete McCoy, who are handling him. Sullivan is not working very hard for two reasons. In the first place he has been taking good care of himself recently, and in the second place, he does not need to in order to knock out Slade. Sullivan has a very poor opinion of the prowess of the Maori, and rightly, too, I think. John will have a 'pudding' next Monday night, and will scoop in 65 per cent of the net receipts."

"How does he train?"

"He gets up between 6 and 7 o'clock and takes a walk of two miles; breakfast is eaten at 8 o'clock, after which he lays around until it is nearly digested, when he walks a distance of twelve or fifteen miles, generally running the last two, however, so as to get into a sweat. He is then given a bath and briskly rubbed down, after which he eats a carefully selected dinner. In the afternoon he amuses himself by playing base ball or football, followed by an hour or more at slugging a suspended bag or ball. Supper is then eaten, followed by a walk of about four miles. He retires at 9 o'clock sharp."

"What are Sullivan's plans?"

"He expects to make a professional tour of the country about the last of September, going as far West as California. He may engage in sparring exhibitions for a year after that, when he expects to settle down and attend to his business here."

The newspaper and sporting fraternity of Boston are upon the lookout for something exciting now, as there is a probability of another Elliott-Dunn affair. Sullivan, the Boston bruiser, is howling for gore, while a poor scribe has made a walking arsenal of himself for protection. Col. George Eland, the active sporting editor of the Globe in this city, has mortally offended Sullivan, who, it is alleged, vows revenge. Eland is a long-legged Irishman with close cut hair, but minus a decided brogue. Before the war he was a large planter near New Orleans, and was worth $100,000. At the breaking out of the rebellion he joined the confederates, and was elected colonel by the captains of a large body of cavalry, which afterward captured Nim's battery. The colonel was pretty roughly used by the war, and lost all his money. Later he was an insurance agent, doing a large business, but he was "knocked out" by the Chicago fire. He then became a reporter upon the Cincinnati Enquirer, but he was too original even for that paper. He came East and joined fortunes with the Globe. It was he who started the false story of Sullivan's attack of hemorrhage, and later on he concocted a yarn about Sullivan getting drunk, breaking the furniture in his house, and nearly killing his wife. The champion was almost frantic when the first story was printed about him, but when the other was published he vowed vengeance, and sent word to Eland that he would break him up into little pieces at the first opportunity. The colonel immediately secured a revolver, and swears that if Sullivan lays hands on him he will shoot him like a dog. His knees are a little shaky, however, and he manages to keep out of Sullivan's way. NEL E.

A Veteran Fifer.

Among those present at the Ohio soldiers' reunion at Columbus, which was held last week, was the Rev. Peter Kimball, recently of Cleveland, who was among the musicians, with his fife. Mr. Kimball is a New Hampshire man, but has resided in Ohio for fifty-three years. He played a drum in 1809, and was a militiaman in his native State. He is now in the ninety-sixth year of his age, and says the present is the happiest period of his life. He has a voice equal to a Fourth of July orator, and attributes his vigor to a proper course of living and to the use of the fife and drum. He never smoked, but once, and that was when he knew no better. There is yet a tinge of original color. When not engaged in teaching, he gives attention to pomology, and has a secret by which he makes barren trees to bear fruit, as well as change the bearing year. The Columbus Dispatch says Mr. Kimball was one of the instruments in founding Marietta college. He is now on his way to Illinois. He carries a copy of the United States constitution, as he has done for for the past fifty years, from which he often quotes in support of any question of politics which he may champion. Without the use of glasses Mr. Kimball is able to read the finest print, and thinks a man, by properly taking care of himself, should live 150 years. He is certainly a wonderfully preserved man for one of his years.

Newton's Accounts O. K.

Grand Forks News: F. J. Sterrett, of the firm of Sterrett, Hill & Childs, is now in this city with S. P. Spates, one of their agents, and both have carefully looked into the affairs of their late agent, W. J. Newton. They say that all his accounts are exact to a penny, but that the 3,000 bushels of wheat now in the elevator are in very bad condition. It is now thought that Mr. Newton's reason for committing suicide was despondency at the prospect of the discovery of the condition of the wheat and his inevitable discharge. Mr. Newton has been suffering from Bright's disease for some time, and this undoubtedly tended to make him still more despondent. The body of the deceased was sent to Crookston to-day. Deceased was insured in the Knights of Honor for $2,000.

WHO'S MY LOVE?

They query who my love may be
I answer, "She's a mystery."
I only know, one gentle night,
Shone first on me her starry light.

'Tis asked if she will bide with me;
I know what is, trust what shall be.
Who was not born can never die;
Our present hides the by-and-bye.

She'll be with me somehow, somewhere,
Perchance in happy homes of air;
Too much an angel for the earth,
Too human for celestial birth.

HE PULLED THE SILKEN STRING

Opening of the Southern Exposition at Louisville by President Arthur—A Thrilling Scene.

The opening of the Louisville Southern exposition, Wednesday, by President Arthur, was an imposing event. The city was crowded, and hours before the formal opening, a procession miles in length was on the way to the exposition building. At 11:50 the cortege approached the grounds, where 20,000 persons were in waiting, and the wildest cheers mingled with music from the Seventh Regiment band and local musical organizations. The military formed in lines, open order, with presented arms, as the president, uncovered, passed into the building, closely followed by the Legion, which stacked arms at the entrance doors. An archway of flowers decorated the march to the grand stand, every Southern plant being represented. At exactly 12:20 o'clock the president mounted the stand. The reception committee, walking two and two, preceded him, Dr. L. P. Yandell and Col. Kemp Goodloe being at their head. President Arthur was accompanied by President Dupont of the exposition, Secretary Lincoln by Gen. Basil Duke, Secretary Folger by Gen. William Preston, Postmaster General Gresham by Col. John Mason Brown, and Gov. Blackburn by Judge Rollins of New York. As the president made his appearance he was immediately recognized by the crowd, and a cheer was raised, which broadened into a great shout of welcome as he took his seat directly in the center of the stand. By his left hand sat Gov. Blackburn and on his right President Dupont of the exposition. Near by sat the members of the cabinet, Gen. Phil Sheridan, Congressmen Morey and Lowry of Ohio, and those who accompanied them. As soon as quiet was restored after the crowd had vented its enthusiasm, Rev. Dr. Perkins, of St. Paul's Episcopal church, delivered the invocation. At the close of the prayer Mayor Charles A. Jacob delivered the address of welcome to the president, full of generous phrases, embodying the sentiments of the people of Kentucky and the South toward the distinguished guests who had come to aid us in extending the benificent advantages of agriculture and manufactures. Concluding his remarks Mayor Jacob extended his hand to the president in token of his welcome, amid the wildest applause of the audience. The good, old, gray head of Gov. Blackburn was now seen advancing toward the president, and renewed cheers broke forth, the applause for several moments being deafening. The venerable governor did not attempt any speech, but simply said: "Fellow-citizens, it is my pleasure, and I have the honor of introducing to you the chief executive of the United States, our president, Chester A. Arthur." Another wild round of applause followed this introduction, in the midst of which the president came to the front of the grand stand, gazed over the vast audience, bowed, and spoke as follows:

I count myself fortunate that I am within the borders of this beautiful city of the South on a day which must be henceforth famous in its history, for a great undertaking, an undertaking of national interest and importance, enters here and now upon its career. I congratulate the promoters and managers of this exposition that, even at this very threshold of its existence, it gives abundant pledges of success. The zeal and enthusiasm which they have displayed in their labors of preparation, and the frequent tidings of encouragement and cheer by which those labors have been lightened and made glad, the splendid triumphs of American genius, activity and skill which are arranged within these walls, the presence of the eager multitude who throng these hospitable streets, are all tokens that the enterprise here inaugurated will be crowned with brilliant, far-reaching and enduring results. It will multiply the aims of industry; better its operations, and elevate its standard of attainment. By suggesting new wants, it will unite new activities. It will disclose natural resources as yet almost unexplored, and point the way to their prompt and profitable development. In countless ways it will promote the arts of peace, and help to bring about the works of peace, proclaiming harmony and good will and brotherly kindness throughout all the land, and unto all the inhabitants thereof. [Great applause.] I now declare that the Southern exposition is open, and may God speed the fulfillment of all its lofty and ennobling purposes. [Immense applause.]

When President Arthur declared the exposition open, the enthusiastic crowd signified their approval again, and the president, reaching out his hand, pulled the silken cord dangling above the stand, thereby opening the throttle of the Reynolds Corliss engine, and putting in operation all the engines in the machinery department. A chime of bells pealed forth, and then the grand organ, presided over by Prof. George Roller, the Seventh Regiment band, under Cappa's leadership, and the festival chorus of 500 voices, under the direction of Mr. Donald McPherson, started the well-known air, America. Ten thousand copies of My Country, 'Tis of Thee, had been distributed among the throng, and those who were musically inclined joined in the patriotic and inspiriting song. Meantime, the president had left the stand, accompanied by the reception committee, and walked about the building, inspecting the displays. From the art gallery the president went to lunch with Mr. Dupont, at his home in the park, and later dined with the Pendennis club. The next morning at 8 o'clock he departed for Chicago.

A Sensational Dramatic Wedding.

Osmond Tearle, leading man of Wallack's company, was married Tuesday morning to Minnie Conway, a well known actress. The wedding occurred in Miss Rose Coghlan's rooms at the Windsor hotel, Denver, Rev. Charles Marshall officiating. The wedding breakfast, provided by Miss Coghlan, was a very elegant affair. Tearle was recently divorced in New York, and Miss Conway was also recently divorced from her husband, Jules Levy, the famous cornetist. The affair has produced a sensation. Miss Conway arrived from New York Monday last. An effort was made to keep the details of the marriage quiet. Miss Minnie Conway, whose name has of late been before the courts frequently, is a handsome blonde who fell a victim to the fascinations of Mr. Levy, or Mr. Levy's cornet, and seven years ago was married to him. Levy, however, already had a wife and family in England, and at length trouble arose in his new domestic relations. While Mr. Levy was letting the sea breezes waft the dulcet strains of his cornet to the ears of admiring crowds at Coney Island, Mrs. Levy went abroad to study music. There she met Mr. Tearle, and the two arrived together in this city on the same steamer. Then the trouble increased. Mrs. Levy now appeared upon the scene and began a suit for divorce against her husband who had procured from her a divorce in a Western State without thinking it worth while to impart the information to her. The deserted wife returned to England before the termination of the proceedings, but another suit was begun in her name and a decree of absolute divorce was obtained. Then Mrs. Levy No. 2 had her marriage with Levy annulled. This decree was entered last week, and left all the parties to the proceedings as they were before Miss Conway succumbed to the fascinations of the cornet. But her health compelled a visit to the balmy air of Colorado, whither, by a curious coincidence, Mr. Tearle had preceded her. Mr. Tearle had not been altogether free from marital troubles. The day before Mrs. Levy-Conway-Tearle obtained her decree of annulment Mary Alice Tearle obtained an absolute divorce from her husband, George Osmond Tearle.

The Turtle Mountain Sun Dance.

At this time the Sioux under Little Chief and Iron Heart are encamped around Fort Totten, Dak. To a traveler who visited the fort last week they said they would give their scalplocks if Mr. Arthur would ride over to see them during his Yellowstone trip. Soon after the traveler reached the fort he witnessed a "sun dance." He heard a din, and presently over the hill at a furious pace came the Indians, each riding a horse bareback, all in war paint and feathers, and each carrying a large branch of a tree. It looked like an approaching forest. There are 700 of these Indians at the reservation, and they looked just as seen in pictures. They paint themselves from head to foot, and wear nothing but a cloth around the hips. There are two long pieces of cloth hanging from the waist, thickly sown with feathers. Their legs have two bracelets of bells set in fur. One fellow was painted a bright lemon color from head to foot, with a belt of bright feathers around his waist, sweeping the ground. A long braid of hair hung down his back; brass buttons and thimbles were worked in; one side of his head being shaved and the other side not, and an immense cockscomb of red feathers on top. There was one painted stone color, with any number of beads hung around his neck. They carried tomahawks, spears and many queer instruments. The bodies of many of them were fearfully painted. About 150 braves took part in the dance.

The Hon. George F. Fdmunds, the senator from Vermont, would succeed to the presidency in the event of Mr. Arthur's death, he having been elected president of the senate last March, when that position was vacated by the Hon. David Davis.

There is such a thing as pushing a real estate boom too far, and certain northwestern cities are beginning to realize this fact. The continual turning over of town lots and lands is a poor substitute for legitimate industry in all other branches of business upon which present and future residents depend for a living.

Accroding to experts, there is something beyond calculation in the speed of steamers. Two boats may be built simultaneously from the same model, with every effort to make them precise duplicates as to shape and machinery, and yet one will prove faster than the other. Why this is no one can tell. The Mary Powell has for the last fifteen years been the swiftest on the Hudson River. During all time she has never been beaten. Time and again and exact counterpart has been built, with everything copied as the best mechanics and facilities could do it, but none of these has turned out as good as the original. Experience has been the same with yachtsmen. They order copies of the swiftest craft, or combine the supposed good points of several, and nine times out of ten are disappointed in the result.

The partial interruption of telegraph communication has resulted in an increase of the letter mails. At New York the increase was fifteen per cent. in a week, and probably this ratio will hold goods throughout the country. No one undervalues the telegraph for the instantaneous transmission of important intelligence, but the question has arisen whether it has not been used oftener than is necessary and for insignificant objects—whether it is not a luxury that could be dispensed with in many cases without detriment to anybody but telegraphic stockholders. This custom of transmitting trivial intelligence by such an expensive medium might well be curtailed—it certainly would be if money were not so plentiful.

The seasons business in what is known as "garden truck" at the south has been very profitable. Georgia alone has about 7000 car loads of melons, one county clearing over $100,000. On cucumbers, onions, &c., immense profits were realized, and for the first time the people began to realize the value of their lands, prices having gone up from $5 to $50 an acre. Lands hitherto worth but little are now vested with a market price. A diversity of products has been established, new markets have been created, which will lead to more next year. Railroad and commission menhave been interested in .the business, so that the developement in view is outside of calculations. Markets have been opened up as far as Omaha, Denver, and Kansas City. Interior towns in Wisconsin, Iowa, an Minnesota and many points in the east, where southern melons were never seen before.

There has been a remarkable decline in stock speculations during the past year, and Wall street complains of dull times. Seats in the Stock Exchange cost $36,000 only a year ago, and now they are sold for a little more than $20,000, and there is a fear among the members of the exchange that there may be a stampede which will make seats comparatively valueless. The truth is a paralysis in the business of stock speculation. This is not due to any scarcity of men who would be eager to take a hand in stock speculation, but to the general conviction that the chances for success are against them. In thousands of cases men and women know by bitter experience that the dice of the stock market are loaded. Stocks are also sold as investments, but these transactions which are likened to games of chance are only a fraction of what they were two years ago. There is nothing unhealthy in the decline of stock speculations. On the other hand it is a sign of greater intelligence of the people and more conservative tendencies among all classes.

The Northern Pacific railroad will be completed and opened in September, just 10 years after the financial disaster, which overtook the enterprise in 1873 and which precipitated the long commercial depression. When the company suspended in 1873 it had 450 miles constructed in Minnesota and Dakota and 105 in Washington territory. The road when completed in September will nearly be 2,000 miles long upon its main line and about 600 upon its branches. The celebration of the completion of this new channel of trade between the oceans will take place near the Mullan tunnel on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains in Montana September 8 and will be attended by a large party of invited guests, including leading stockholders from Europe, all the living ex-presidents of the road (among them Frederick Billings and Gov. Smith of Vermont), and many friends of the journalists. President Villard will drive the last spike and William M. Evarts will make an address. There is some expectation that Mr. Arthur will be there. The Northern Pacific party will leave New York August 29 and go through to Portland, Oregon, after the completion of the road, and return the same way taking about a month in all. The excursion party will occupy forty cars, in four sections of ten each, with ample provisions for the whole trip, and accompanied by the best cooks and caterers. The demand for invitation tickets has been almost phenomenal, and all sorts of influences have been used to obtain them, but Mr. Villard is said to have a single eye to business in this matter, ane that few will go who have not been and cannot be of material service to the road will join the excursion.

Another slight earthquake shock was felt at Casamicciola on Sunday.

Gen. Ruggles, who was formerly on Gen. Terry's staff, and recently acting adjutant general of the army, said on the 13 inst., in the presence of an ex-officer, who is authority for the statement, that he had little hope for Col. Ilges, at the hands of the president. He had recently a conversation with the president on the case, and the president said in very positive language that he intended to put a stop to the practice of duplicating pay accounts. "But, Mr. President," said a gentleman present, "none of Ilges's accounts were presented to the paymaster except those on which he was paid." "It makes no difference," replied the president. "The offense consists in assigning accounts to outside persons and then drawing pay for the same periods. I intend to put a stop to the practice." The inference is, that if the court recommends dismissal, Col. Ilges cannot hope for executive clemency.

The decrease in the receipts from the internal tax on tobacco for the fiscal year ended June 30th last was $5-287,739 as compared with the receipts for the previous year. This was due mostly to the decreased tax which went into effect on May 1st. The tobacco tax in the aggregate yielded the immense sum of $42,104,249. This is a very important item in the receipts of the government. It is generally understood that a vigorous combined effort will be made at the next session of congress to abolish all tax on tobacco.

Deputy Internal Revenue Commissioner Rogers says it is the duty of collectors to determine whether Hostetter's bitters should be taxed, and any appeals from their decision had better be taken to the courts in order that uniformity of action might be had; that the internal revenue bureau would be bound by such settlement as the courts might agree upon, and that they alone possessed a remedy for the subject. It is probable that a test case will shortly be made in the western district of Pennsylvania, where Hostetter's bitters are manufactured.

The Helena Independent says the first Northern Pacific train to cross the main range of the Rocky mountains, passed over the overhead line on the 7th inst. It consisted of a locomotive with five loaded cars. They made the trip with ease, showing the overhead line to be practicable and a thorough success. This is the highest point on the Northern Pacific between St. Paul and Portland, the altitude being 6,000 feet. Helena is now connected by rail with the Pacific slope.

Chief Engineer Anderson, of the Northern Pacific, says surveyors are now at work laying out the new branch road, leaving the main track six miles this side of Helena and running to Wickes, a distance of twenty miles. Grading will be commenced the latter part of the week.

The Great Coke Monopoly.

A syndicate has gained control of the vast coke interests about Connellsville, Pa., the great coke burning district of the country. The syndicate is composed of Dr. Hostetter. H. W. Vanderbilt, and a few other capitalists. These gentlemen will build a railroad from Harrisburg to Pittsburg, through the Connellsville coke region, with a capital of $14,000,000, all of which has been paid in. The line will be about 250 miles in length, and connect with the Vanderbilt roads. The work of construction has already begun, and will probably be completed in a year. Messrs. Frick and Oliver has long had large interests on the Connellsville coke industry, and, with other members of the syndicate, have been quietly buying in the coal veins and ovens until they have obtained control over the entire coke interests of the region. This places at their disposal a giant monopoly, one of the most important interests in the State of Pennsylvania, and the most extensive coke region in the country.

A Land Boomer Jailed.

C. M. Dittman, who has been a big land and lot boomer at St. Paul for some months, with but little capital, was jailed on the 13th inst., on the charge of forgery. The arrest was made upon a warrant which was sworn out in the municipal court by George Barbaras, cashier of the National Bank of Hastings. The complaint sets forth that "the accused did feloniously utter and publish as true, and upon one E. A. Whitford, a certain false and forged promissory note, he, the said Dittman, and forged with the intent to cheat and defraud."

Whitford is the assistant cashier of the bank of Hastings. It is understood that there had been other forgeries, amounting to $30,000, committed by Dittman, a part of which were of Lane K. Stone's name. It has for some time past been well known that Dittman is deeply involved; and it will be remembered that a few weeks ago a statement concerning his affairs, in which he claimed that he had satisfied all his creditors, and that he could have something left over for himself after making settlement with them. Then came the report of the failure of the bank at Monticello. Along during this time there were various ugly rumors afloat concerning Mr. Dittman's business acts, and very greatly affecting his character.

The local scribes who have been lauding Dittman to the skies, are now writing him down. Such is life among the boomers.

A Gory Claim Agent.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Aug. 13.—Col. N. W. Fitzgerald, the claim agent who has had trouble with the interior department, made a brutal assault upon Gen. Boynton, correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, at the latter's office. Gen. Boynton had telegraphed the facts in the case to his paper. Col. Fitzgerald swore he would fight every correspondent who sent off the news, and commenced with Gen. Boynton. As Fitzgerald is a powerfully-built man and took Boynton unawares, the latter was getting the worst of it when his assistant came to his rescue and Col. Fitzgerald was forcibly ejected into the street. Fitzgerald again attacked Gen. Boynton in a drug store near Newspaper row, knocking him down. The parties were quickly separated, however, and were taken to the station house. At the station Fitzgerald made threats against a lawyer named Pelham, who retaliated on the spot by doubling the claim agent up in a corner with a blow from his fist. Fitzgerald is out on bail to-night, looking for the other correspondents. The affair created a great deal of excitement on Newspaper row, and a fine crop of gore is predicted before the matter ends. Gen. Boynton denounced Col. Fitzgerald and his firm of claim agents as a set of swindlers who had grown rich by pundering unfortunate ex-soldiers of the late war.

A Monument for Mat. Carpenter.

On the first of December next there will be erected over the grave of the lamented Senator Carpenter, in Forest Home cemetery, Milwaukee, a stately work of mortuary art, a fitting tribute in memoriam of his bereaved family. The work is a cabinet monument, a right line Grecian composition, seven feet square at grade, and twenty-five feet seven inches high, composed of plinth, bases, die and capital, wrought from light Barre, Vt., granite. The design is fresh in conception, bespeaking dignity and repose in every line. The shadows and high lights are few, but powerful, the grand effect being obtained by well proportioned masses, blending softly in receding growing lines pyramidically, from base to apex. The base bears in bold raised letters the family name, and on the front of the die the record of his entity and epitaph are cut in letters raised, unpolished. In front of the monument a flight of granite steps, flanked with massive swelling buttresses, graved granite flower vases, forms the approach from the street. The finished work aggregates sixty tons in weight, and is constructed to withstand for many centuries the blighting touch of time; and in its silent dignity will tell the curious visitor a most impressive story of the broken kasket of an immortal soul, wrapped in eternal slumber at its base.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Minnesota's Revenue District.

The consolidation of the two internal revenue districts of Minnesota is complete, all the requirements of the law having been complied with, and yesterday William Bickel, the collector for the entire State, made the following appointments of deputies and the local force in general office at St. Paul:

First District—W. G. Dye of Winona.
Second District—C. A. Baker of Hastings.
Third District—A. G. Wedge of Albert Lea.
Fourth District—D. B. Owen of Mankato.
Fifth District—J. B. Sackett of St. Peter.
Sixth District—C. P. Barnard of St. Paul.
Seventh District—Charles H. Clarke of Minneapolis.
Eighth District—George W. Benedict of Sauk Rapids.
Revenue Stamp Deputies—E. N. Leavans of Faribault and V. G. Hush of Minneapolis.
Local Office Force—Victor Berggren, cashier; A. F. Nordin of Kandiyohi, and J. W. Walsh of Albert Lea, office deputies, and W. F. Bickel, clerk.

All the above deputies and clerks are appointed direct by Collector Bickel, and the following-named persons have been appointed United States guagers upon his recommendation:

Adam Bohland and Adolph Henschel of St. Paul, J. G. Peltier of Minneapolis, and Louis D. Frost of Winona.

All these officers were in the city yesterday in consultation with Collector Bickel, and received their certificates of appointment. The annual salary paid to each deputy is about $1,000, and the division deputies are allowed from $100 to $400 for traveling expenses. The collector and other officers pay their own expenses. The guagers are paid by fees. Collector Bickel estimates the collections of his office at $600,000 for the present fiscal year, and the amount will be collected at an expense of less than 3 per cent, including all expenses, together with the collector's salary. The State is divided into eight districts, and the deputies in each district are required to visit each county in their respective divisions once each month. At present there are 105 cigar manufactories, 103 breweries and 42 wholesale liquor and rectifying establishments in the State.

Second Regiment Minnesota State Troops.

Capt. Lawson, of the Twenty-fifth infantry, U. S. A., at the request of Gov. Hubbard, and in compliance with special order, No. 117, from headquarters, department of Dakota, has submitted a report of his observation while in camp with the second regiment at Camp Hubbard, New Ulm, in the month of July last. He speaks in terms of praise of the sight selected for the camp at New Ulm. He says the company drills were fair in the manual and company movements, and that two of the companies, namely, A and B did quite well in the skirmish drill on several occasions. The battalion drills were good, considering that five of the companies were new troops, having been organized since their last annual encampment. These companies were never in camp before. What these new companies needed most was a thorough drill in the "school of the soldier," as it would teach the men to be steady in the ranks, and improve their soldierly appearance.

Capt. Lawton compliments Col. Bobletter; says target practice was not very good; discipline was fairly maintained; the personnel first class, etc. The report closes as follows:

As you requested me to make any recommendations that I thought proper, I would respectfully submit the following:

First—That all the old rifles now on hand of the 50 caliber, be turned in and replaced by the 45 caliber, with safety notch; that captains of companies see that the arms are properly cared for, and, if possible, an armory provided for each company.

Second—That both officers and men be required to pass a physical examination before they are accepted in the service of the state.

Third—That but one place of encampment be used for all troops at the annual encampment. This will save the trouble and expense of shipping camp equipage from one encampment to another.

Fourth—That before going to their next annual encampment the articles of war, or so much of them as relates to a soldier's duty, and by which all soldiers are governed when in the service of their country, be read to each company.

Fifth—That some dress hat be adopted for all mounted officers.

Minnesota's First Teacher Dead.

The old settlers of Minnesota will hear with regret that one of their number, Mrs. Harriet E. Bishop, died at her residence in St Paul, on the 8th, after a protracted illness. Mrs. Bishop was truly a pioneer of the state, having come to St. Paul in 1847, in order to establish a school. She was born in Vergennes, Vt., Jan. 1, 1817, and was early filled with a wish to become a teacher of youth, and also to engage in missionary work. She was one of a class of several young ladies who had been trained for the profession of teacher at Albany, N. Y. by the celebrated Miss Catherine Beecher, when a letter was read to the class by her from Gov. Slade of Vermont, president of the National Popular Educational society, stating that he had just received an urgent request from Rev. T. S. Williamson, Indian Missionary at Kaposia, that he (Gov. S.) would send a female teacher to open a school in St Paul, a little village near by, and proposed to Mrs. Bishop that she should accept the offer. After some natural hesitation, caused by the long journey into a region mostly occupied by savages, she consented, and in July, 1847, landed at St. Paul. She at once commenced teaching school and continued in the profession for many years. She established the first Sabbath school in St Paul (July, 1847) and at the close of the following year aided in organizing the First Baptist church, of which she remained a faithful member until her death. In 1857 she published a very entertaining and valuable volume entitled Floral Homes or First Year's in Minnesota. In 1863 Mrs. Bishop published another historical work The Dakota War Whoop, being an account of the Sioux massacre of 1862. This work went through two editions.

A Heroine at Brainerd.

BRAINERD, Special Telegram, Aug. 13.—Mandie Davis, a little five-year-old daughter of Walter Davis of this city, was saved from drowning here at noon to-day, by the very daring and thoughtful act of Miss Minnie Merritt, aged about eighteen, niece of Hon. G. F. Kindred. The little child fell by accident into a cistern at Mrs. Merritt's house, and was discovered by Miss Merritt just as she was going down for the last time. No assistance was near, and realizing that something must be done at once, she thought not of her own safety, but plunged in after her. The water came up to her neck, but she succeeded in diving, she does not know how, and grasping the child by her clothing and bringing her to the surface, where she held her until her mother, attracted by her cries, come and relieved her of the child and helped her out. The little one was in a senseless condition. A physician who was summoned was some time in returning animation. She is now past all danger, however.

The Crookston land office has been crowded to its fullest capacity for several days by parties filing upon lands the thirteen townships which were recently thrown open to settlement. The work has been pushed so rapidly that nearly the entire district is already entered. About ninety per cent. of the settlers are Scandinavians.

Report on the First Regiment.

From the official report to the governor, of Capt. Gaines Lawson, on the First regiment of the Minnesota guard, as inspected by him at White Bear, the following extracts are taken:

The only troops encamped at White Bear were the First regiment, N. G. S. M., Col. W. B. Bend, commanding—a fine tactician, and an officer of great experience in the national guards of New York, and one in every way, as far as I could judge, capable of performing the duties of his office. The company drills were quite good, with a tendency among the new companies to lose distance. Five companies have been organized since the last annual encampment, and some of them quite recently. Some of the companies of this regiment present the appearance of veterans, both in their drill and deportment in camp. The new companies of the regiment were given an extra battalion drill, which proved of great benefit, and before the encampment was broken up all showed marked improvement in drill, and many regretted that they could not remain longer, when all had been benefited by their stay in camp. The formal inspection of the regiment was made by Col. Van Cleve of the governor's staff. There were present 462 officers and men. But one company practiced at the target range—company D, Capt. Bean—and some men of this company made very good scores, the men purchasing their own ammunition. The arms of the command were, on the whole, in good order. Two companies are armed with the Springfield rifle, caliber 50, and the remainder with the Springfield rifle, caliber 45, some with and some without the safety notch. All the companies have good armories. This regiment is all uniformed alike, which adds much to their military appearance. Discipline was well maintained. Guard duty was well performed. There were two guard mounts daily, which gave each officer and enlisted man an opportunity to become familiar with guard duty; in other words, the guard was relieved every twelve instead of every twenty-four hours, which I consider an excellent idea for a week's encampment. I would respectfully suggest that the same recommendations as were made in regard to the New Ulm encampment be applied to this regiment, except that which refers to armories.

The house on W. C. Kent's farm, about four miles south of Rochester, was destroyed by fire. Insured for $350, which only partially covers the loss.

Stack, who died in prison some time ago, confessed, when on his death-bed that Farrell was innocent.

The depot at Herman, Grant county caught fire on the night of the 11th, from lightning. The building was saved in a badly damaged condition, the roof being nearly all burned off, but did not fall in. The depot at Donnelly was struck also, but only slightly damaged.

The Daughter of Gen. Morgan.

From the Louisville, Ky., Commercial.

Miss Johnnie Morgan, the General's daughter, was the heroine at the Morgan reunion in Lexington. It did not require a practiced eye to detect the warm admiration entertained for her by her father's faithful followers, and considerable time was spent in presenting them to her. Her close resemblance to her father awakened in them many of the memories of the eventful past, and her sweet face, lady-like grace, calm and gentle voice, as she expressed her great joy at meeting them, stirred their hearts and secured for her all the love and veneration they once had for her father. After paying a glowing tribute to General Morgan, Orator Black turned to Miss Johnnie, who rose gracefully at his greeting. He told her that his comrades, who had loved her illustrious father while living and revered him while dead, had accorded him the pleasing task of conveying to her from them a gentle token of the faithful allegiance which her father enjoyed and the warm admiration they felt for her. He became eloquent as he proceeded with his theme, and closed by saying that "never since the days of ancient chivalry did gallant knight crown fairer queen," and handed her a velvet case containing a handsome gold watch and chain. She stood up bravely under the trying ordeal, during which old soldier's eyes were blinded by unrestrained tears, and turning to the sea of faces she said, with beautiful composure: "Dear friends, I can't begin to tell you that I love you as dearly as my father did, but I sincerely hope that you may always be as happy as you have made me to-day." As she bowed her acknowledgments the giant oaks trembled under the deafening shouts that went up from a thousand throats and the boom of artillery.

Tears and Things.

We are annihilated! We are crushed! That is we suppose we are for J. K. Arnold said in his Saturday's issue that he had effectually sat down on us so we suppose we must be. He did not sit down upon us as effectually nor as suddenly as he did on the sidewalk on the Friday evening before but he says he sat down on us heavier being actuated by a different sort o' spirits. He sat down on us by publishing two advertisements to prove that he had announced the opening of the thirteen townships to settlement before any other paper. One of his ads was written by McManus before the land was thrown in the market and the other was a land office notice of final proof; neither original with the Tier and neither announcing that the lands were in market. His attempted excuse is lame and thin and only goes to prove that Johnny got badly left that time by the Chronicle and the JOURNAL. The JOURNAL had an extra on the streets at 2:30 and the Chronicle, being published on that day had the official announcement while the Tier not only failed to get it that day but never has published the official announcement.

Last Thursday we ventured to criticise the Tier, because that "newsy?" sheet failed to notice the opening to settlement of the thirteen townships and in its issue of Friday the Tier gives this explanation of its oversight. It says: "If you want items of local news read the weakly papers!" So then, you don't pretend to give local news in your daily but confine them all to your weakly papers? Well, that explains it. We get your daily but as we never receive the other edition you refer us to of course we can not say that it don't contain local news but we are obliged to take your word for it that you get all the local news you have in your weakly papers. What bothers us most is why you should discriminate by calling your edition issued once a week "weakly" and not apply the same name to the whole business. It appears to us to be all alike.

The Chronicle persists in being mistaken on our position on the withdrawn lands question, and claims that we claim the honor of their opening to settlement. We do nothing of the kind and haven't, and Mr. Dunn sets aside his usual candor when he assumes that we claim that honor. We said (and we can prove it if he likes) that he did not first call the attention of settlers to these lands. If parties had not been there and reported to him he would never have given them the write up he boasts of, for he never took the pains to explore that tract of country, and give it a write up from personal observation. He had to do as we did, depend on those who had been there for information and, as we were here when parties first went in in 1878, of course we got in the first work on the question. But that is really all immaterial, and not to the point. We said that to Paul C. Sletten and Hon. Knute Nelson was due the honor of the opening of these lands, and if hard and persistent work counts for anything, to them belongs the honor, for they did the work.

While the editor of the Detroit "Record" has been wasting newspaper and ink publishing slanderous reports against Paul Sletten, this gentleman has obtained one of the grandest advantages for the people of this district by laboring successfully for the opening of certain lands adjoining the White Earth Reservation, which with the aid of our Congressman Hon. Knute Nelson, has been accomplished. We would ask; Which is most worthy of the confidence of the people? the "cheaply hired howlers" or the officers of the nation, who by their works prove their devotion to the interests of the people? But it is safe to say, that the people will, when called upon, endorse those who have rendered such valuable services.—[Kittson County Enterprise.

Bigamist and Robber.

Memphis, Special Telegram, to the Pioneer Press,

The police to-night arrested J. B. Burdick on the charge of bigamy. He came to Memphis about six months ago, and when arrested was employed as telegraph operator. Burdick has a wife living at Boscobel, Wis., notwithstanding which he married a Miss Mattie Thomas of this city about one month ago. Burdick has several aliases, among them that of Babnett, and when he first came to Memphis he was arrested for the robbery of a gold watch from John McCedderton of Crookston, Minn. The authorities there failed to come for Burdick, and he was released. Taken altogether, he is a very tough citizen. Burdick, when arrested some months ago, claimed to have a wife in New York. To-night, however, he denies having been married to any one else than his Memphis wife.

The Reliance.

The Farmer's Friend. A Machine that is Well Named.

It is said that still waters run the deepest, and perhaps this is the reason that J. W. Lilly & Co. have said so little about the Reliance Twine Binder, made by the Sandwich Manufacturing Co., for the first time introduced into this county this year. On Tuesday the JOURNAL man was invited by Tom Harris to go out to Jake Scott's farm to see the first trial of the machine. We started at 11:15 and when we reached the field the machine had just made its first round in a piece of very short barley, and we were told that it had missed but one bundle. We followed it while it made two more bouts, and we must confess that we were more than favorably impressed with it. We have used the Woods Twine Binder and the Minneapolis Twine Binder on the JOURNAL farm, and we supposed we liked the Minneapolis better than any Binder that walks on wheels, but we must admit that if the Reliance will do as good work in heavy grain as in that light barley it is the boss for reasons hereinafter stated. The first thing we noticed was that Jake had only two horses upon the machine, and they walked it along slowly or rapidly as desired and, on the third round had not sweat a hair, although the ground was very soft, rough and difficult for the horses to travel over, showing remarkable ease of draft, which is one point of great advantage to the farmer. It might be inferred that the machine is constructed of brush timber to make it light enough for two horses to handle, but we examined it closely on that very point and found every part perfectly constructed of the very best material, both wood and iron. We noticed one very great improvement over other machines, that the reel runs slowly, in fact, just fast enough, while the sickle bar plays as fast, or faster, than a mower sickle bar, while the reel is under perfect subjection to the will of the driver, being raised as high or low as he desires by a lever easily handled. The reel ceases to revolve when the machine is thrown out of gear. The carrier is about the same as other machines, if anything, as perfect, with less rigging and machinery. The tying apparatus is a most simple arrangement, that makes a strong knot, which cannot slip nor be pulled apart, and is so very simple that a child old enough to drive a reaper can soon understand all about it and, lacking the usual number of springs and do-funnys, it is not easily got out of repair. But the chief beauty of the machine is in the butter. Now, by this we do not mean to be understood that the machine gives milk, makes olemargarine or even gilt-edged Jersey—not that kind of butter at all; but simply a bit of a notched board that plies swiftly back and forth on the buts of the bundles making, when the sheaf is bound, a square, even but on every bundle. This is a decided improvement and one that every farmer should consider, as it not only makes a neat, square sheaf, but saves an immense amount of grain that is usually wasted in scatterings. One farmer who went out to the trial ordered a machine the next day of Lilly & Co., and all who saw it work pronounced it the boss. Another good point in favor of this new machine is that it does not cost a small fortune to buy it. The price is very reasonable and the terms are easy. For some time we have been under the impression that we should need another self-binder on the JOURNAL farm and, on the quiet, we have been looking out for a machine that suits us. We shall give the Reliance one more trial, in heavy grain, and if it stands the test as well as it did in this case we shall get a Reliance of J. W. Lilly & Co., whose headquarters are on Broadway, near the U. S. Land Office.

Red River Valley Farms.

Grand Forks Herald: There is no better or safer investment for capital to-day, than in the rich farming lands of the Red River Valley. Persons who have lived here for years fail to realize the value of these lands, until they visit the east and west and compare these broad and fertile acres with the lighter soils and frequent unfavorable seasons there found. A Herald representative recently visited Bismarck (half the size of Grand Forks) and found farming lands held at $15 to $25 per acre, and similar prices rule near Jamestown. No intelligent person who has any regard for truth telling, will pretend to assert that the lands of the James or Missouri River Valleys are as rich and productive as those of the Red River Valley. They are not as well able to withstand the extremes of weather, and will not oftener than one year in ten, with the same care and cultivation, yield as many bushels of grain per acre. Within five miles of Grand Forks choice quarter sections of land can be purchased as low as $1,500, and investments at those prices are as sure to yield a profit as is interest to accumulate on govermen onds. There is not an acre in the Red River valley that will not some day, not very distant in the future, sell quickly at $50 cash. The intrinsic value and unlimited productiveness of Red River Valley soil is but half appreciated. There may be now and then a year of "hard times" here as everywhere, but he who owns a Red River Valley farm and cultivates or holds it for an advance in price, has a sure source of income and is as rich as though he had much money in the bank.

RED RIVER CROPS.

A Review of the Situation—A Big Yield Assured.

The Fargo Argus publishes an extensive and comprehensive review of the condition of the wheat and oats in Northern Dakota and Minnesota. The article contains views from nearly every point of importance on the railway lines, and are the views of conservative men, meny of them being bankers and agricultural machine men, whose estimates are regarded as unusually careful. The following is a summary of the article: Cool weather has continued for the past week, being just the weather condition desirable, and the grain throughout the Northwest has made immense strides toward perfect maturity. The wheat has never been so plump, and the husks have never been so uniformly filled in any previous season in the Red River valley. Some farmers assert that the chief troubled to be anticipated is from the shelling of the grain, as the covering had its main growth before the rain fell, and entirely changed the prospect, the grain swelling and distending the husk to its utmost capacity. In a few fields, on high ground, the cutting of wheat has already commenced, and the yield proves to be very heavy. On the Minnesota side of the river the crop will produce a very good general average, and, with the increased acreage, will mean a very large yield for the valley. In the counties of Steele, Foster, Griggs, and other counties in that region, the result of the harvest is set down as far beyond the biggest previous results. The estimates are placed widely apart by different parties, but a careful survey of the situation in all its bearings, shows that at least twenty-two bushels per acre is expected, and, with a continuance of the favorable weather, an average of over thirty bushels in several of the giltedge counties would not be viewed with surprise.

Does Farming Pay.

The proceeds of the Stratton farm, containing 320 acres, situated two miles northeast of Lincoln, will sum up about as follows, for the year 1882:

Grains.—Five thousand bushels of corn, one thousand bushels of oats, some sugar cane, vegetables, two hundred and fifty bushels of potatoes, ten tons of turnips, three tons of beets, thirteen wagon loads of field pumpkins and squashes, and an abundance of garden vegetables of the finest varities.

Hay and Pasture.—Two hundred tons of hay; on the farm are two fenced pastures, one of wire, that kept eight head of cows, some young cattle, and would have supplied as many more; the other of board fence, in which run twenty head of horses.

Fruits.—There was an abundance of grapes, also good variety of small fruits; a lot of peaches, the first bearing of three hundred trees; a few apples gathered from an orchard planted four years ago, consisting of two thousand trees.

Hogs.—There were fed hogs, of which about $1,000 were sold early in the fall at $7 per 400, live weight.

Weeeds.—None were allowed to grow on the farm. All the drives and avenues, as well as highways bordering on the farm, of which there are two miles and a half, planted with maples, were kept mowed and free from weeds; also a well-kept lawn with a good variety of evergreens and shrubbery.

Besides all this, the rise in value of the farm, would be about equal to forty percent on all investments.

Pure Water for Hogs.

Swine are subject to the same laws that govern the health of other animals. Vegetable and animal matters, in a decaying state, when introduced into the system are detrimental to health. Such matters are readily introduced with water, being taken directly into the stomach soon pass to the intestines, etc., and become a source of disease is produced by the disease germs being carried into the stomach in foul water. It is now believed that this and many other diseases, are due to minute organisms, so low in the scale of organic life, that it is difficult to say whether they are vegetable or animal; they are known by the general name of "disease germs." The vitality of these germs is not great, except when preserved, as it is in water containing organic substances. In the water of pools, ditches and ponds, their vitality is preserved for some time. If hogs are forced to drink such water they take into their bodies the seeds of disease.

In August, hogs suffer most from unwholesome water. During this month they require much water, and it is more essential that it be pure than during any other time of the year. The sun is hot, the air dry, the earth parched; the hog has a compact body, formed largely of fat, small limbs imbedded in masses of flesh and fat, and with its nostrils near the ground. It inhales dust, which in part consists of decaying vegetadles. Every thing conspires to produce a feverish state of the body, and a great thirst, to be allayed only by large quantities of cold water. But water from creeks, ponds, and the like, are at this season the most heated. The greatest fatality among swine is in September and October. As the period from the inception of the disease to its fatal termination is from thirty to forty days it would appear that the disease germs are most often taken into the body of the animal in August.—John M. Stahl, in Am. Agriculturist.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, AUG. 16

County News.

St. Hilaire Packet.

From the Spectator

Barley is nearly ready for harvest and wheat will be commenced on in about two weeks.

Paul Bataglia and "Skin George" of Crookston are taking in the sights of our city to-day.

Our farmers have nearly completed their haying and many of them are coming into town and purchasing provisions for harvest. Our merchants are consequently kept busy.

Mrs. Capt. Jennings and daughter, of the Sherman, were the guests of Mrs. Judges Ives on Sunday last.

Mrs Bunnell, wife of our engineer was with her Jack at this end of the line on Sunday last.

Mr. A. Yvernault, one of Crookston s merchants and a part owner of the townsite of St. Hilaire, was up noting improvements on Saturday and Sunday last.

Mr. C. C. Utzinger has disposed of his little team of iron grays to Mr. Nelson Buck, for five hundred dollars. This was a pretty big price to pay for a small team of horses, but in this instance the purchaser got good value for his money.

At a distance of 140 feet, the men working on the artesian well for Mr. R. C. Jones, struck a vein of water, which flows about 15 barrels per day. The water, however, is of a sulphurous nature, and we understand that Mr, Jones will go down stil further.

Mr. M. M. Van Gieson, the handsome man from Crookston, was "pulverizing" some of St. Hilaire's blushing beauties on Sunday last. Our boys think that Crookston ought to have enough young ladies to supply the demand, but as Van is a genial fellow we don't think there will be any blood spilled.

We would like to hire a threshing machine for a few days to thresh out samples of grain which we have received within the past three weeks. If they were all threshed out, we think there would be enough No 1 hard to over-stock the market. But "the cry is still they come" and each farmer is confident that he has the biggest yield in this country.

Seth Turner, the man who used to raise corn for ten cents a bushel in Illinois is doing much better selling New Era graders in Minnesota. He has already disposed of three or four in this vicinity and will probably get rid of a couple more before he leaves. People are just waking up to the fact that we must have roads and ditches in this country and that we must have New Era graders to make them with.

For general unadulterated gush and check, we give credit to the St. Hilaire Spectator when it says, "This paper is the most popular paper in the county." Where are the rest of us.—Daily Northern Tier.

We fail to see where the check comes in. We simply gave the testimony of our readers, a large number of which are residents of Crookston. If the Spectator has any rivals for popularity in this county, the Northern Tier is not among the number, even though it is a daily. Silly trash, and stale jokes do not make a popular paper Mr. Tier. Legitimate news is what the people want in this country.

Sheriff Zwickey, of Crookston, chief runner for Zwickey's Polk Co. Hotel, (the one at which the county commissioners have just reduced the board to $3.50 per week) came into our cage on Friday last. We of course, trembled considerably when we saw him, but got over our scare when he informed us that he wasn't looking for boarders this trip but came up to get our opinion as to who would be the best man to run for president on the Republican ticket in 1884. We said that after due consideration and advisement, we had come to the conclusion that Capt J. K. Arnold of the Northern Tier was the man whom the "people would most delight to honor" with the nomination. Zwickey has not been heard of since, and any information as to his whereabouts would be thankfully received by sorrowing friends.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Thursday afternoon about four o'clock a little daughter of Mrs. Rhoda Anderson, some eight years of age, had the misfortune of breaking her right arm near the wrist, The facts of the case, as near as can be gleaned, are that the child while playing with a small basket filled with pebbles, became frightened at the actions of a man named Furlong and in attempting to run away fell on her arm with the above result. The bone was splintered in a number of places thereby rendering re-setting very difficult, and it will be several months before the child can have free use of the arm. Doctor Lankester was summoned and reduced the fracture in a skillful manner.

On Monday night some farmers living on Red river imbibed too much cold tea, with the result that they drove through the woods at 10 at night with a speed emulating that of Maud S. About half way across they found a stump in their way, and being superior to such things, endeavored to drive through it. They failed, and broke themselves up, wagon and all. Two got broken heads while the third received a comminuted fracture of the right arm, which will lay him up some months. Dr. Lankester reduced the fracture and the man is progressing satisfactorily, although the doctor still fears amputation may be necessary, as the bone is very badly splintered.

Mr. J. C. Bennett, superintendent of the immense Manitoba railroad ditch, which is being cut some five or six miles north of here, reports the work as being pushed forward as rapidly as several New Era graders, twenty teams and some seventy men can do the work. This ditch mentioned in the Bulletin some weeks since as being dug through towns 151, 152, 153 and 154, range 49, by the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad company, and will drain some thirty miles of otherwise useless lands, leading the water into the Red rive. The ditch is being dug from two to six feet in depth, and has a fall of nearly two and one-half feet per mile, which is sufficient to carry off all surplus water. Mr. Bennett stated that he expects to have the contract completed by the first of October. He and the company deserves credit for the manner in which the work is being done, as this drainage will prove of great advantage to farmers in that vicinity by enhancing the value of their real estate, and the only thing lacking to insure the success of the drain is to dredge the river branch into which the same opens, which allow us to hope, may speedily be accomplished.

Mortgage Sale.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of four hundred and sixty-seven and 71-100 dollars ($467 71-100) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Michael Schiltz (a single man) to the Farmers and Mechanics Savings Bank of Minneapolis, bearing date the nineteenth day of December, A. D. 1881, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the twenty-sixth day of January, A. D. 1882, at 3:10 o'clock p. m., in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 108, 109 and 110. Said mortgage conveyed the real estate hereinafter described to secure the payment of four hundred and twenty-five ($425 00) dollars, due in five years, with interest at the rate of nine per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and default has been made in the payment of interest on said sum. Wherefore, in accordance with the provisions of said mortgage, the whole principal sum secured thereby, together with the interest thereon accrued, is hereby declared to be due and payable immediately; and no action or proceeding has been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter (nw¼) of section twenty-two (22) Township one hundred and fifty-two (152) Range forty-six (46) containing one hundred and sixty acres (more or less) according to the United States government survey thereof, which land is situate in Polk County, and State of Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances: which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Court House, in the City of Crookston, in said county and State, on the fifteenth day of September, A. D. 1883, at 9:15 o'clock a. m. of that day, at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash, to pay said debt and interest, and the taxes, if any, on said premises, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in and by said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale, as provided by law.

Dated August 1st, A. D. 1883.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA. THURSDAY, AUGUST 23, 1883. NO. 17

We had the pleasure, one day last week, to spend a day at Alexandria, the home of the Congressman from the new Fifth District, the Hon. Knute Nelson. Arriving at the ghostly hour of 1 o'clock a. m., we wereescorted to the Lesseps house which we found so full of guests that we had to wait until 2:30 until some guests could be taken out and hung up on pegs or sent off on the morning train or something of that kind. Be that as it may we got a good bed about 3 a. m., and enjoyed a short snooze until breakfast time. After breakfast, the Hon. Knute Nelson appeared with a fine team, and drove us about the city which we found to be a lovely little place containing about 2,000 inhabitants, beautifully located upon the banks of two lovely little lakes, Agnes and Winona. After viewing the city and its many improvements, prominent among which is a large $30,000 brick school building, just being erected we were driven to the residence of the Hon. Knute Nelson, just in the suburbs and gazed, for the first time upon the celebrated Kilbourn claim which figured so conspicuously during the late campaign. Mr. Nelson is a good farmer as well as statesman and we were permitted to see as fine a crop of wheat growing on sixty acres as we ever saw. He has also several acres in oats, corn and vegetables which shows that he understands the advantages of cultivation. Mr. Nelson has a beautiful residence upon that famous Kilbourn place, where, surrounded by his excellent wife and family he is prepared to welcome his numerous friends and enjoy life to its fullest extent. After an hour spent in looking over the farm and grounds we were driven to the new hotel just erected upon the banks of the beautiful lake Geneva, one of the chain of lakes which is destined in the near future to make Alexandria one of the most noted pleasure resorts in the State. These lakes are being connected by canals to admit of the passage of the beautiful little steamer which plies upon those already so connected which already afford a ride of 30 miles or so. At the hotel we met Messrs. Talbot and Hobert, of the Railway Age, with their wives, who, with a party of ladies and gentlemen from Alexandria were going on an excursion through lakes Geneva, Le Homme Dieu, Carlos and Darling, as far as the present system of canals would permit. We had the honor of being a passenger upon the first steamboat whose shrill whistle ever awoke the echoes along the shores of lovely lake Carlos. To attempt a description of those lovely lakes we should need the imagination of a poet, with the pencil of an artist and then we should come far short of the reality. Beautiful gravelled shores, fringed with living green, bays, inviting the mariner to tarry awhile in their lovely retreats, while ever and anon a neat little residence nestling amid the trees peeps out upon the boats as they pass, all forming a picture that must be seen to be fully appreciated. After a most enjoyable day we were safely landed at the hotel upon the shores of Lake Geneva where we did ample justice to as fine a spread as hungry mortal would wish to see. This hotel, but just completed shows but faintly what it will be when the surroundings have had the attention which is contemplated. Suffice it to say that if any of our readers ever desire a pleasant summer's outing we know of no place where the inducements offered are more attractive than those of lovely little Alexandria with her beautiful chain of lakes.

The Harvest.

Minneapolis Tribune.

The wheat harvest in the Northwest is opening up all along the line. The weather continues to be singularly favorable to the best possible results. The advices from the harvest fields are monotonously satisfactory. The general business community, which experienced a thorough scare during the first half of June, is finally becoming convinced that the newspapers have not been lying in regard to the improved condition of things and the assured prosprct of a good yield. The results is a sharp revival of confidence in all lines of trade and a disposition to consider another twelve months of prosperity among the certainties. Jobbers report collections and sales to be improving already on the strength of the harvest to be, while manufacturers of and dealers in farm machinery swell the chorus of assurance that, after all the threats of early summer, this season is to prove itself to be one of the most solidly satisfactory in the history of the Northwest.

Autumn Tree Planting.

In those northern localities where the season of autumn is brief, planting at that time is not advisable; but in a large part of the country, after the first few frosts, there is a long succession of the most delightful days, and winter approaches slowly. In such localities, fruit trees may be planted in the fall with decided benefit. A tree is not like a stake stuck in the ground, to remain unchanged. The tree, though at rest, is still alive. Its buds and bark keep up a certain activity. It is well known that if apparently dormant cuttings of the grape or currant be set out in the fall, they will form a callus at the lower end, and the currant, especially, will even produce roots; all this takes place without the presence of a leaf or any apparent life in the cutting. When a tree is planted in the warm soil in autumn, its roots begin to heal where they have been wounded, and new fibres push out and help fix the roots in the soil. A certain work of preparation which the roots must do hurriedly in the spring, if planted at that time, is much better done in autumn, and when the growing season begins, the tree is prepared for it. Wet soils are not favorable for autumn planting, nor indeed for any other. If the earth will be saturated with water in winter, it is no place for the roots of trees. Heel-in the trees, and by laying drains, prepare the land for setting them next spring. In planting trees at this season, they should have the preparation we have advised for spring, i. e., to smoothly cut all broken roots, and to diminish the tops one-third to one-half; more-over, a sharp mound of earth should be made around the base of eact tree, a foot or eighteen inches high, both to steady it against heavy winds, and to keep off the mice. The stone fruits, peaches, cherries, etc., are regarded as less suited to fall planting than apples, pears, etc.; but in the peach districts of Delaware and Maryland, extensive plantings are made in autumn. The planting of deciduous ornamental trees is subject to the same conditions as that of fruit trees, and the same may be said of currants and other fruit-bearing shrubs.—[American Agriculturists.

Why do Boys Leave the Farm?

When I realize that the greater part of our farmers' sons leave the farm never to return to agricultural pursuits it makes me sad. When I look back some thirty-five years to the time I was a lad, and bring up to mind my playmates, over twenty in number, mostly farmers' sons, and see only one of them following agriculture I stand aghast. What are the reasons for all this? They are many. When a child is young it forms its likes and dislikes, and they are apt to cling throughout life.

To illustrate, I will bring up before my vision some of the old farmers who are dead and gone, who used to farm it when I was a boy. There stands one who would say, "good morning" when he saw me going to school, and give me a lift into his wagon and let me ride, asking me questions and encouraging me to do what was right. There stands another who would pass me by, never condescending to look at or speak to me, and if I chanced to pick up a nut that had fallen on the highway near his farm, he would yell at, and set his dog on me. The one is associated in my mind with love and reverence. The other—I will not say what.

If you want the boys to stay on the farm throw around them those little enjoyments that will make their lives happy. Let them have a piece of ground to till and have what they raise on it. Teach them how to graft, to bud, and all those little things that require science and study. Make everything interesting to them in their younger days and if there is any kind of work that is particularly distasteful to them, do not force them to do it.

If you wish to drive them from the farm, send them out to cut green wood at the back door and tell them they must get up at five o'clock and make a fire from it. Send them to milk by lantern light in the dead of winter when the cold winds are blowing through the cracks of the barn. Have them drive the cattle to water and be obliged to chop a hole through the ice in order to let them drink. Let them carry water the year around up hill from a spring. Have them turn the grind-stone for hours. "Send them out to pull wool from the dead carcass of a sheep when they have to hold the nose with one hand and pull with the other." Make them do all the drudgery and disagreeable work found to be done on the farm, giving the pleasant work to the hired man. Tell them there is no time to go a fishing or hunting. And when you come to your meals when everything should be pleasant and you should have a smile on your face, cry out, and say, "We are going to have a drouth, and we will have to go to the poor house," and "The season is so wet there will be a failure of crops and I will not be able to pay my taxes." Fret and scold about everything that does not go just right. These, with many other things that could be mentioned, are driving our sons from the farm.

Our farmers' sons, when they become old enough to choose an occupation, stand, as it were, upon a great divide. They cast their eyes one way and see millionaires, who but a few years ago could be numbered by the fingers of the hands, and to-day by the hairs of the head. They see our Senators, many of them going to Congress poor and in a few years becoming immensely rich. They see our railroad kings piling up their tens of millions with very little manual labor. They look the other way and see the old farm houses and barns needing repairs. They see their fathers and mothers toiling in order to get a living by the sweat of their brows, accumulating very little property, except it be by the advance of real estate. They see their fathers paying a greater proportion of taxes than other classes of people do. These and many other things they are revolving in their minds, and they say: "I will not remain on the old farm I will go out into the world and run the chances of becoming rich."

It has been the pride and boast of farmers that the most of our great men were raised on the farm. If this be so, where will we get our great men in the future, if the old stock is not kept up? How many good men can be found to-day in this country, who are in the public life, who dare stand forth and utter the truth, who cannot be bought and sold, who are willing to work for the interest of their country? This is a subject I wish every farmer would make a study, and ask himself if he is not in a measure to blame for these things.—Roger W. Griswold, in Farm and Home.

Farmers Arbitrate, Don't Litigate.

The law favors arbitration as a peaceable and inexpensive method of settling difficulties. In many of the States there are statutory provisions, by which a judgment of the Court may be rendered on the award or finding of arbitrators, concerning a matter duly submitted to them. It is almost always possible to take a case out of Court, and submit it to referees at any stage of its progress. In the absence of any statutory provision, it is always lawful for parties to agree to submit their differences to arbitrators, and abide by their decision. The agreement to do so may be either oral or written, but the latter is the better way. The form is not essential, except that the meaning should be carefully expressed. It is customary, in adding to the agreement, for the parties to execute to each other an arbitration bond, conditioned on each party performing the award given by the arbitrators, whatever it may be. If the award is properly made, it then becomes binding on the parties.

Arbitration is well worth considering by farmers, who find themselves in dispute about some simple question of fact, as, for instance, the amount of damage which A's breechy cattle have done to B's corn, or as to what was the value of A's sheep which were killed by B's bad dog. Such questions can generally be quickly, cheaply, and justly settled by one or more fair-minded neighbors, and the expense, delay, and aggravation of a suit in Court may thus be avoided.—American Agriculturist for September.

The leading feature of the American Agriculturist for September is its carefully prepared list of the State, County, and other fairs, which fills eight solid columns, and will be found to be a most useful guide to the various exhibitions. Among the full-page Illustrations are a pleasing picture, by Cary, of Children in a Cotton Field, and farm life among the Indians in North Carolina. Flockmasters will be interested in the engravings which show the improvement made in Merino sheep since the last century, in diminishing the size of the horns and increasing the quontity and fineness of the fleece. However valuable the lustrous fibre of the Alpaca may be, one would not, after reading the illustrated account of Alpaca farming, care to engage in its production. In marked contrast with the rude and desolate home of the Alpaca farmer of South America, are the beautiful scenes which illustrate the editorial notes of a trip beyond the Missouri, among the fertile farms of Nebraska and Wyoming. Full details are given of a prize barn, with estimates of the cost of materials and labor. The many conveniences it affords for a moderate outlay, must adapt it to the wants of many farmers in all parts of the country. A characteristic feature of the American Agriculturist, has always been the many farm conveniences and labor-saving appliances given in its columns, especially those which can be made upon the farm. The present number has its share of these, including an improved milking stool, brush rake, bailed box, cart for ensilage. Various needs of the orchard and garden are provided for. The household department is attractive, and the children are provided with interesting and instructive reading. There are over 700 originol engravings in the September American Agriculturist. The following are the leading writers in this issue of the paper: George Thurber, A. B. Allen, Wm. Clift, F. D. Curtis, Joseph Harris, Orange Judd, David W. Judd, Alfred Trumble, P. H. Jacobs, H. A. Haigh, John Morrison, Jr., F. Grundy, M. C. Weld, W. W. Meech, L. D. Snook, W. E. Stone, J. M. Stahl.

Houston & Co., having sold out all of their McCormick self-binders have secured another lot which are going off like hot cakes.

Andrew Steenerson has returned from a visit to Minneapolis where he went to consult a doctor for heart disease. He looks pretty slim.

Arne Higdem was in the city on Wednesday with a company of land hunters whom he was escorting into the famous thirteen townships.

Peter Huss is putting in pool and billiard tables and henceforth his guests will not have to go away from home if they wish a quiet game.

Martin Bang went after chickens on Tuesday. Although he Bang-ed away all day he returned with no chickens. We should advise Mart to take along a cue next time. He makes good shots with that.

Land Commissioner, C. W. Holcomb, of Washington, D. C., dropped into the U. S. Land Office on Friday last. He expressed perfect satisfaction in the manner in which he found the affairs of th eoffice.

Chris Solfest, over in Fairfax on Saturday last commenced harvest. He commenced with a cradle. He thinks he won't thresh that crop for several years as it is a boy and requires some time to mature before threshing.

A drive of several miles north on Saturday showed wheat ripening very fast and everybody getting ready to go into the harvest field at an early day. Other grains and vegetables are looking splendidly and we saw several very fine pieces of barly nearly ready to cut.

While below, Mr. D. Jacobus bought a fine blooded mare which looks like she could get over the ground like a bird. Jake will take the dust from no man when on the road with this animal. A trot is arranged for to-day if the road is not too heavy from recent rain.

Lilly & Co, since the reaper trial, reported in these columns last week, have sold eight or ten of those Reliance Self-binders and are crowded with orders. M. E. Bartlett came out on Monday and took a Reliance over to the JOURNAL farm which on Tuesday was set up ready for business next week.

The lumber for the Fair Grounds has arrived and is being taken over and put into fence and buildings at a rapid rate. No pains nor expense is being spared to make this coming fair an event long to be remembered. We have advices from the east part of the county that every body up there is coming with a grand display.

We are sorry to learn that Mr. F. McDonald, whose arrival at his son's residence we last week noted, does not improve as fast as his friends could wish. Dan has telegraphed to his brothers Angus and John to come in haste. The old gentleman is 72 years old and the complicated nature of his disease together with his age renders his recovery extremely doubtful.

While out north on Saturday we noticed the grain on Win McPherson's place, which was among the best we saw. Last fall Mac. thought he would try a new plan, so he plowed his fields in very narraw lands leaving a deep dead-furrow between each land, and took good care to plow very deep and well. The result is that he has the best wheat and oats he ever raised and no man in that vicinity has a better looking crop than Mac.

Big posters are out announcing the county fair, which event commences September 11th, lasting four days. This fair promises to beat every former effort in this line ever attempted in the county, and in order to make it a complete success it only needs the earnest effort of every farmer to bring along some of the productions of the soil, his stock, and everything that will show what kind of a country we live in. The attractions offered are many and great. Ample premiums are offered and all should attend.

Mr. John Knuppe sent a lot of fine samples of grain to St. Paul for the Minneapolis fair, among which we saw splendid samples of wheat from E. D. Childs & Co's farm, wheat and barley from the farm of John Wyand, a sample from Dick Hussy's farm, a sample of barley from the JOURNAL farm, and a sample of the finest oats we ever saw in the country from Anchor farm, owned by John Knuppe. These oats stood nearly six feet high in the field, are well headed out and look capable of yielding 100 bushels per acre. They are of the White Russian variety.

Dept. Sheriff Hopkins starts the busy reaper this week.

C. C. Utzinger expects to be ready for business by Saturday.

Dr. Van Dyke was called to Euclid by a telegram on Wednesday night.

Mr. Wm. Guse intends to join his wife in Minneapolis the first of September.

Ex-Lieut. Governor Barto, of Sauk Center, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday.

Mr. J. R. Clements is adding some finishing touches to his fine residence on the avenue.

The fair grounds are almost surrounded by a good high fence and the work is being rapidly completed.

Hugh Robertson started east on Monday night's train. Hugh insists that it is not so, but—we can tell better when he returns.

Jake Francis reports the best looking crop he ever had on his place. He expects to get a self-binder and go for that grain next week.

Herb Mason arrived on Wednesday morning and now look out for greater attractions than ever at the postoffice news stand and the branch.

John and Angus McDonald, of Turtle River, arrived on Wednesday to see their father who is very sick at the residence of Marshal Dan McDonald.

The receipts Tuesday night at the Talmage lecture lacked only a few dollars of being sufficient to cover expenses. We understand that it has been made up.

Ole Bang and Knute Nelson returned from their claims in the thirteen townships the first of the week. They report that they have secured the boss pine lands.

Register Cromb took a bit of an outing on Saturday last, to run down to his old home at Lake Park. By the way, that new house of his is nearly ready for occupancy.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Chiniquy departed for Chicago and the east last night. Mr. C, will put in an immense stock for the fall and winter trade, which will be duly announced on his return.

Wm. Wylie, the genial Black River postmaster, was in the city this week telling about the fine crops in the Black River country. He says barley cutting is nearly over and wheat harvest well begun.

Mr. John Grey is very sick, at Carman, with typhoid fever. One of our city papers has erroneously stated that it was Lester Grey. Dr. Van Dyke is caring for him and has hopes of his recovery.

Mr. Wm. Smith, of Black River, was in the city on Tuesday and Wednesday after machinery. He thinks the face of nature has a smile onto it like unto a broad grin at the bountiful harvest now at hand.

Mrs. Frankie Hopkins goes to-morrow evening to Minneapolis where she has accepted a position as teacher in the high schools of that city. She is an accomplished teacher and will meet with deserved success.

Mr. Wm. Davidson, of the Keystone farm, gave us a pleasant call on Monday. He reports crops on the Keystone looking splendidly. They have 3,100 acres to cut and twenty-four self-binders to do the work.

The Land Office will probably be moved into the new building so as to be ready to open out in fine style on Monday morning next. The officials will occupy a fine suite of rooms and have things in far better shape than ever before.

It was Auditor P. J. McGuire who was setting up the cigars on Wednesday all on account of a deputy auditor who arrived at Mac's house the evening before. Mother and son doing nicely and the doctor has strong hopes of being able to save Mac.

From the Maple Lake country we learn that wheat harvest is well commenced. Mr. Collins showed us a splendid sample of No. 1 Hard wheat for which the happy owner had been offered 95 cents and refused it because it is worth more.

While the JOURNAL is going to press a big time is being had upon the race course among our local sportsmen. Several new horses enter the field among which are Ben McKinney's and D, Jacobus' new racers which lends enough of uncertainty to make it interesting.

Mr. L. Fontaine left for a month's trip east on Wednesday night. During his absence he will visit New York, Boston and the principal eastern cities in the interests of his firm. Mrs. Fontaine will shortly go to Minneapolis with her eldest daughter who enters school there for a year.

Neat cards just printed at the JOURNAL job rooms, announce that the Northwestern Band and Orchestra are now prepared to furnish first-class music, brass or string, for balls, parties, street parades, or any other occasion, at reasonable charges and guarantee satisfaction. All orders addressed to C. A. Davis, Crookston, will receive prompt attention.

Orders have been received from the commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, instructing our officials to cause all final proof notices hereafter given to be published six weeks instead of five as heretofore, and parties, who are alien born, desiring to enter government lands under the homestead and timber culture acts must state in their affidavits that they have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States and must furnish record proof of the same to accompany their applications and affidavits. All notices of final proofs heretofore made will not be affected by the ruling which applies only to those hereafter given.

On Friday last, in company with R. W. Ranney, the boss contractor, we took a pleasant drive out through Fairfax to the farm of Albert Simpson, about two miles east of the Russia farm. Along the entire route we did not see one poor piece of grain and we saw many fields of wheat that promise 20 bushels and upwards, and oats that indicate from 50 to 80 bushels. We took a shot gun along, and became so interested in trying to scare a few chickens to death, that Ranney lost his coat out of the buggy, and did not miss it until we had nearly reached Crookston on our return. We captured nine birds and figuring up all expenses, (including the coat) we found that they only cost $1.50 apiece. As that ain't much for a good chicken and those we got were good ones, we heartily enjoyed a splendid chicken pie on Saturday. In closing we would request everybody who finds Ranney's coat to bring it to the JOURNAL office and we will forward it to him C. O. D.

Ole Rudi will start on Saturday after a deep well on his farm in Fairfax.

A young people's meeting has been organized of the younger members of each church. The meetings will be held in the Baptist church every Sabbath evening commencing at 6:45 and dismissing in time for the regular church services.

It seems that Mr. Talmage did not receive the letter addressed to him, requesting him to include Beecher's lecture on Evolution among the "Big Blunders." It was expected that he would refer to Beecher lecture during his own but he did not.

PHENOMENA OF DEATH.

Dissolution as Painless and Unconscious as Birth.

"The ideal death," said a physician in charge of the New York city hospitals to a reporter of the Sun, "was that of my uncle. He was a hale, hearty man of 80, a bachelor, wealthy and surrounded with every comfort in a beautiful home not far from New York. He had traveled in Europe and was full of anecdote and memory of his long life. He arose one morning apparently in perfect health. His buoyancy of spirits was noticed. He expected a visit from me, and as he desired to confer with me on a matter of business, he arose from the table after a hasty and partial meal, saying he would drive down to the depot, not far away, and bring me to the house. He had the servant bring the ponies to the door and refused to let the man go with him, saying he preferred to drive himself. He mounted the box and drove off at a smart pace. The old gentleman had not driven more than a few rods from his own house when he was met by a neighbor who noticed something strange in his appearance. His horses stopped. The neighbor dismounted and went to the side of his carriage and spoke to him. The old gentleman did not answer. He sat upright in his seat, holding the reins in his hand. He was dead. He had passed away without a shock of any kind. There was no apparent cause for his death, which was probably occasioned by heart disease!"

Dr. L. L. Seaman, physician in chief of Charity Hospital, Blackwell's Island, took great interest in observing the much-vaunted death scenes of Sara Bernhardt, and when once started on the subject he is apt to give a judgment of the great actress' performances some what different from the general conclusions of the dramatic critics. Speaking on the subject the other day, Dr. Seaman said that Mdlle. Bernhardt had seven different ways of dying, and all of them were totally unlike anything he had ever seen in a medical practice covering many thousands of cases in all kinds of death.

"Of course I do not hold myself responsible for the deaths in my hospital any more than for the births," said Dr. Seamen. "Many persons come in when they are almost in the last moments of life. Many are known to be absolutely beyond hope of recovery. But my observations convinces me that the dramatists and actors have far over-estimated the pains of death, and especially the possibilities of great mental effort just previous to the moment of dissolution.

It is in fact, about as difficult to tell when a man dies as to determine when he goes to sleep. Death is a natural, not a sudden process. I am speaking now of death by disease, not of violent death. Possibly in the representation of violent death, the actors may come somewhere near the truth, but generally their pictures of death by disease are to one who knows the truth, simply ridiculous. Dissolution is as painless and unconscious as birth. The approach to it may be protracted and painful. There may be long and agonizing scenes resulting from disordered imagination. Death destroys one organ after another, not all all at once. The last organs to yield are the lungs which show their oppression in the breathing, and produce what is termed the death rattle. As soon as the lungs cease to act, the black venous blood is no longer changed to red arterial blood, but is propelled unpurified from the heart and thus poisons the body like a narcotic. The energies of the brain are gradually lulled as in the approach of sleep, and unconscious cerebral action produces the murmur of names of friends, or recollections of past life, or reference to whatever has passed through the mind. But that there is pain in natural death I have long ceased to believe."

A veteran physician, speaking on this subject, recently said: "Judging of the thoughts of men by their words just previous to death, I should say it often happens that a dying person gives no indication of thought upon a subject that has been the favorite topic of a lifetime. I have known active business men with important affairs unattended to who died with words upon their lips that indicated absorption in some incident of the moment, generally relating to personal comfort. It was that sort of a death that Washington Irving died, saying; 'Well, I must arrange my pillows for another weary night; if this could only end.' Long suffering under the afflictions of a painful disease will serve to divert the mind of the strongest. Even the philosopher, Ben Franklin, was forced to say with his last breath: 'A dying man can do nothing easy.' It is a very common thing for dying persons to express sympathy with attendants who had been fatigued in attending them. Among the last words of Sir Walter Scott were: 'Poor souls, I know you were up all night.'

And yet, where there has not been protracted suffering, and where the administration of narcotics has not produced a wandering mind, a dying person will manifest an interest in whatever has been the uppermost thought of his life. Lord Chesterfield is reported to have illustrated his proverbial politeness by requesting that a friend at his bedside should be offered a chair. Very often the last words indicate thoughtfulness for loved ones, such as the utterance of Charles II., "Let not poor Nelly starve," or of Thomas Jefferson, who said, "I resign my soul to God, and my daughter to my country." It is but natural that whatever consciousness is felt at the moment of death should be that of affection. I have seen it expressed in a loving look, or a pressure of the hand, often long after the power of speech had gone."

"How about the fascial expression of dying persons?"

"That is often spasmodic. The laughing or crying muscles are often excited in the convulsions of death when there are no corresponding feelings. In the same way there are often muscular contortions of the mouths of infants, who are believed to be smiling, when, in fact, they are troubled with stomach ache."

"Have you ever observed the visions and ecstatic delights that are often spoken of by religious writers?"

"Certainly. They are quite common, and not at all confined to religious persons. Experienced physicians testify that most persons die in a state of trance. Although they are apparently conscious they pass away in a state of dreaming. Often they seem to be listening to musical sounds. Sometimes they seem to be beckoned by angels."

"And do you regard such exhibitions as purely physical?"

"Just as much so as any dream. They are controlled by the ordinary thoughts and feelings, the every day life and education and imagination of the subject in precisely the same way as a dream is so controlled. Generally a dream is a reproduction of a waking thought. The curious jumble of subject in a dream is the result of absence of volition. There is a suspension of the functions of the median tract of the brain. The same thing occurs in the mesmeric trance. The suspension may be temporary, and then the person may not only return to consciousness, but remember some of the curious things seen in the vision. Something of the same nature occurs in taking opium. In the early stages of opium eating the subject appears to have mental operations going on at once. One is fantastic and odd, and other normal and regular. In such a case one is able to keep up a running comment on the vision passing before his eyes.

The death of a healthy person is always a very different thing from the death of a diseased person. In cases of accident, where persons know that they must die in a very short time, unless the shock has been very great, they preserve their customary trains of thought; they direct their affairs with comparative composure."

"Have you ever known persons to die in a comical mood?"

"There are historic cases. Douglass Jerrold is reported to have said: 'Why torture a dying creature doctor?' and everybody remembers the dying joke of Robert Burns—'Don't let the awkward squad fire over me.'

"It must be remembered, however, that what are called the last words of great men may have been uttered a considerable time before death—either hours or days. Some allowance must be made for the impossibility of procuring testimony. When the late Dr. Beard died, after having become widely known as an intelligent and educated skeptic, his sister proclaimed that he had recanted on his death-bed, and had indicated his hope of heaven by pointing upward, and saying, 'Higher, higher.' But the attendant, who was beside Dr. Beard, said the words 'Higher, higher,' had no reference to a future state of existence but were simply an indication that the Doctor wished to be raised on his pillow.

Men of Tact.

A lawyer in large practice once asserted that lawyers in the higher walks of their profession were distinguished as peace-makers. To substantiate his assertion, he said that he had settled more cases in his office, during the year, than had been tried in the Supreme Court of the state, within the same period.

That lawyer was noted for his tact. His habit was to bring the disputants into a private conference over which he presided as a mutual friend. The result usually was that both parties came to a settlement, without going to law.

The late Thurlow Weed was also noted for his tact in managing men. He never debated with a person whom he wished to win. He would let him talk, argue, and assert. Occassionally Mr. Weed would make a suggestion or start an objection but in such a modest way as not to alarm the person's pride nor to put him in a hostile attitude. The conference usually ended in the person adopting Mr. Weed's view of the matter, while thinking that he himself had been the influential, instead of the influenced party.

Strategy is tact applied to war. A general who wins a victory by a battle when he could have conquered by strategy is looked upon as a butcher by his profession, though the unthinking rabble may shout for him as a hero.

While John Lawrence was commissioner of the Trans-Sutlej States in India, news was brought him that three hundred Sikhs, the best warriors of the country, had manned the hill fortress of Kote-Kangra and raised the standard of rebellion. Their leader had sent out the defiant words that he would not surrender the keys of the fort unless the "Lion of the Punjab," the Sikh's hero; Runjeet Sing himself, returned from the dead and demanded them of him.

The fort was a small Gibraltar. It stood on a precipitous and isolated rock four hundred feet high, which was connected with the main range of hills by a narrow ridge, twenty yards wide. This neck was defended by strong walls. A winding passage through seven gateways gave the only access to the fort.

The English, by extraordinary exertions and skill, had brought heavy guns to their camp at the foot of the hills on which the fort was situated. The evening after their arrival, a deputation of three graybeards came out of the fort to the English camp.

They had been persuaded by an influential and friendly Sikh to come and at least hear what terms the English would make for the surrender of the fort. For several hours they remained and talked over the matter. They were quiet, courteous, but determined.

At last, they rose to make their salaam of departure, when John Lawrence, with his usual tact, determined to see if a moral impression might not be made upon them. He suggested that they should remain over night and see the guns at day-break ascend the hill. They agreed, but with a gesture indicating that they did not believe that even the English would haul heavy guns up that steep hill.

At four o'clock in the morning the incredulous Sikhs were awakened by loud cheering. They rushed from their beds thinking the garrison had made a sally. But what was their astonishment when they saw two large elephants slowly pulling, tandem fashion, a heavy gun, while a third pushed it from behind!

They stood amazed, as gun after gun was hauled and pushed up the narrow pathway, and by the help of hundreds of Sepoys, safely rounded past the sharp corners which seemed to make further progress impossible.

The Silk graybeards looked, but said not a word. When the last gun had been put into position on the plateau which commanded the fort, they took their departure. In an hour the white flag was raised by the garrison. Man by man they defiled out, threw down their arms and left for their homes. A bloodless victory was thus won by the tact of a canny Scotch-Irishman, who knew human nature.—Youth's Companion.

How a Lawyer Author Gave Himself Away

Professor Swing, of Chicago, in an address at the Acton, Ind., assemblage last week approved of judicious novel reading, and told this anecdote: "I heard of a Chicago lawyer once whose wife read two novels to him while he was sick, and he said to her: 'I have been entirely too much wrapped up in law, and have forgotten almost everything else. When I get well I shall lay aside my statues and write a novel," and so he did. The first chapter told about a nice young man and a pretty young woman The second told how they met and fell in love. The third, a very pretty chapter, told how they took a walk together in the evening and how they got outside the town because the sun went down and they couldn't see the corporation line. It was a very romantic story, but he spoiled it in the next chapter. After the lovers were appropriately seated in the shade of a spreading oak, although it was night, the young man said: "Adelaide, I can no longer conceal my feelings. I love you madly, distractedly, wildly. I cannot live without you. Your image is in my heart by night and by day, and without you my life is incomplete." Now, that was all very pretty, but—would you believe it?—the lawyer commenced that maiden's answer to that burning declaration with: "The other party responded substantially as follows," and that took away all the romance."

Business failures are reported quite numerous at Winnipeg, as a result of the almost total collapse of the real estate boom which placed two-thirds of the people in a condition bordering on insanity about two years ago.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Agricultural Paragraphs.

The methods for success on the farm have changed—in the advance of agricultural science and economy, the advantages of certain locations may have changed, and the true economies of business have changed—but the opportunities for success have neither faded nor changed.

The public roads in Prussia are lined each side with a row of fruit or other useful trees, which are cared for by the government, and private companies that build high roads are similarly obliged to line them. The crop from these trees is annually rented out and the revenue obtained helps to keep the roads in repair.

By a recent act of the Maine legislature, poultry cannot be exposed for sale, excepting live chickens and young geese or ducks, unless the entire head, entrails, feathers; and contents of the crop are removed. It is found that the law does not interfere with the profits of the seller, and consumers receive their poultry in much sounder condition than by the present custom of selling it with only the feathers removed.

Sewers, cesspools, cisterns, and old wells should never be entered until it has been certainly ascertained that they are not charged with gases and vapors deadly to human life. To insure the safety to any one compelled to descend into such places it is necessary to lower, by means of a string or wire, a tin pan or other (flat vessel) containing a small quantity of ordinary gunpowder, and then ignite that by dropping live coals on it. After the explosion it is well to lower a lighted candle to the bottom. If it continues to burn, it can be taken as a sure test that all danger is removed, and the descent can safely be made.

This principle of careful selection of seed should not stop in the vegetable garden but may with profit be extended to the grain field and forest. In every grain field variations in growth and productiveness occur, and the farmer who has eyes educated to such things will be sure to find them. Taking grain for seed from a bin in which the entire crop has been stored may answer very well, but it is not the way to make progress or improve a variety. The best and cleanest plot, whether it be large or small, should be taken for seed, and kept separate from the main crop. This rule applies to all kinds of grain, and if every farmer would practice it we would hear less of deterioration or the running out of varieties.

Decorative Notes.

Painting on brass is newer than on silk or satin. Plaques, trays, candlesticks of burnished brass are now sold for decorating. They are more durable than many things which have been used for art work, and are growing in favor.

Banner screens are more used than wall banners. They are hung from a brass rod which is fastened to the mantelpiece. Flowers are prettier than landscapes for such purposes, though sometimes marine views look well painted on satin. Animals' heads are often used for decorative purposes, and are very effective when well executed.

A clock stand may be made by covering a round, square, or other shaped block of wood with plush or velvet. A small braid over the edges, and a monogram or medallion painted or embroidered on the front, is all the ornament necessary.

A portiere of dotted Swiss muslin, having tiny spangles sewed between each dot on both sides of the muslin, and the portiere edged with narrow gold lace, is beautiful in effect.

Delicate Lambrequins for your guest chamber may be made at odd moments of the popular and pretty darned net; trim the edges with lace, and line with a colored silesia which is pretty and in harmony with its environments.

Really handsome mats are made of felt with borders of daisies and of golden rod, or of poppies and green leaves, worked with crewels. If you purchase the pattern so much used by which you can stamp your pattern yourself, the expense is trifling. A very pretty mat is of blue felt with scroll like border, worked with yellow. Scarlet and canary color, olive and old gold are all very tastefully used together.

Life of Weed Seeds.

A writer in one of the eastern agricultural contemporaries thinks there is no use of trying to exterminate weeds, as the soil is full of the seeds, "down to bed rock," where they were deposited ages ago, and remain dormant until turned up by the plow or other implements used in cultivating the soil. This is certainly a good excuse for a lazy man but the theory advanced will not bear the test of science or practice. Weed seeds will not live for ever, or any considerable number of years in the soil, and if they were deposited in the earth during the glacial period, or during any other ancient period they would spring up on the newly turned soil on the western prairies, or even upon land recently cleared of timber; but the pestiferous weeds never appear upon new lands until introduced with grain, grass or the droppings of stock. The old adage of "one year's seeding makes nine years' weeding." is a very true one and it is a pity that more of our farmers and gardeners do not heed it, instead of seeking some excuse for allowing weeds to grow and mature their seed.—New York Sun.

Value of Grasses.

Prof. J. B. Killebrew, who has made grasses a study, claims that the "acknowledged superiority of English cattle, sheep and other domestic animals, over those of France, or any other country, for that matter, is due more to the superiority in the quality and quantity of the meadows and pastures than to anything else." The statement that the amount of grass grown will give the measure of the degree of advancement to which agriculture has reached, holds good, however, only of the cultivated grasses. "As low and humble as grass appears, it comprises about one-sixth of all the vegetation of the world," says the professor, "and nourishes more animals than all other food combined, and furnishes all the elements for animal growth."

Timothy, in this report, is placed at the head of all grasses in its nutritive qualities, but it cannot be pastured in safety nor must it be cut below the first joint with scythe or machine. Red top is given the second place in importance among the cultivated grasses, it being the most permanent grass grown, yet orchard grass is diffused more extensively than any other grasses, growing all over Europe, the northwestern part of Africa and in Asia Minor. It grows everywhere between 35 and 47 degrees north latitude.

Family Help in Farming.

Rural New Yorker.—A poor man on a farm, to be successful, should enlist the interest and co-operation of his family. The best way I know of to do that, is to talk his plans over to them, and to draw out their opinions and suggestions. It will not only teach to plan them well, but it will give them an interest in the work. They will feel like partners in the business and all will work for the same end. A man's wife and children should always be his first counsellors, as they are not likely to counsel against their own interests. Of course he should take all outside information he can get, that he can approve of. If his family understand the condition of the business they will be more sure to live within the income; an opposite course might be disastrous. The boys and girls of such farmers would be content to stay at home instead of rushing off to cities to get employment that would interest them. Farmers' children above 10 years old should have some stock of their own, to furnish their own clothes as far as the value of it would go. They should manage or plan for themselves, getting good advice with regard to their plans. They would then soon feel an interest in the work. Our four oldest girls have each a cow, and when they go out to milk they feel they have an interest in the product. Boys should have sheep or something of their own, not given to them and then on the slightest provocation taken from them. Give them a chance and they will soon keep themselves, while helping you. The whole family must move along together to insure success.

Pretty Aprons.

Fancy aprons are now in vogue for morning and even evening home wear. They are made of cambric, plain and figured, muslin, and even of mull or in silk, and are trimmed with embroideries, laces and ribbons. One style is made with fine plaits of cambric meeting in the center, bordered at the side with handsome open work embroidery. The bib is of the embroidery, and is pointed below the waist, where it meets the perpendicular plaits. A more elaborate apron is made, alternating stripes of muslin with lace insertion, full lace frills all around, a pocket surrounded by lace and clusters of loops of satin ribbon. A dressy appearance is given by ornamenting the front of the apron below the bib with several frills of lace. Charming little aprons are made of silk or satin and trimmed with Spanish or French lace in white or black—sometimes both, and loops of ribbon or sprays of flowers.

Retention of Juices in Cooking Meats.

Existing thus in a liquid state in our ordinary flesh meats, it is liable to be wasted in the course of cookery, especially if the cook has only received the customary technical education and remains in technological ignorance. To illustrate this, let us suppose that a leg of mutton, a slice of cod, or a piece of salmon, is to be cooked in water, "boiled," s the cook says. Keeping in mind the fact that in its liquid state alum is diffusible in water, the reader may now stand as scientific umpire in answering the question whether the fish or the flesh should be put in hot water at once, or in cold water, and be gradually heated. The "big-endians" and the "little-endians" of Liliput were not more definitely divided than are certain cooking authorities on this question in reference to fish. I refer to the two which are practically consulted in my own household, that by Mrs. Beeton, some sheet tablets hanging in the kitchen. Mrs. Beaton says pour cold water on the fish, the tablets say immerse in hot water. Confining our attention at present to the albumen, what must happen if the fish or flesh is put in cold water, which is gradually heated? Obviously a loss of albumen by exudation and diffusion through the water, especially in the case of sliced fish or of meat exposing much surface of fibres cut across. It is also evident that such loss of albumen will be shown by its coagulation when the water is sufficiently heated. Practical readers will at once recognize in the "scum" which rises to the surface of the boiling water, and in the milkiness that is more or less diffused throughout it, the evidence of such loss of albumen. This loss indicates the desirability of plunging the fish or flesh at once into hot water enough to immediately coagulate the superficial albumen, and thereby plug the pores through which the inner albuminous juice otherwise exudes. But this is not all. There are other juices besides albumen, and these are the most important of the flavoring constituents, and, with the other constituents, of animal food, have great nutritive value; so much so that animal food is quite tasteless and almost worthless without them.—W. Matieu Williams, in Popular Science Monthly.

Thoughts on Housekeeping.

Brain power makes our civilization. The iron horse which crosses the continent, the floating fleets which traverse the sea, the sending of magic words which, in less than time almost, encircle the globe, the powerful machinery of our manufactories, the swift reaper, the delicate astronomical and philosophical instruments are all the result of superior intelligence. The work of great minds has not only accomplished wonderful things in the material world, but it shows great results in the formation and upbuilding of governments, and in the mental and moral training of nations. Men of powerful intellect have been instrumental in making our government what it is, and to-day multitudes are led and taught by the brain workers of the land. This God-given power is not always used to the best purpose, but its influence is none the less evident.

As the most powerful minds accomplish great results, so the work of a superior mind shows even in the humble things of life. The mental capacity and power of a person affects to a greater or less degree his whole life both physically and morally. In the case of children, and in the small details and humdrum duties of a busy housewife is this mental superiority of one individual over another often seen. Brain work many times lessens physical labor and reduces great tasks to small ones. Any woman of ordinaay capacity will not have to look far to see how much time and labor may often be saved by planning, arranging, and systematizing the duties which she has to perform. "Let your head save your heels" is a very homely expression, but it is advice which means a great deal, and if it were heeded there would be a vast amount of labor and trouble saved in many a household. No matter what the occupation is, unless the mind is applied to the task it will in most cases, prove a failure.

There needs to be a more intelligent study and understanding of this work of housekeeping. It must be taken as a whole, and in detail, and each department made to yield the best results with the least labor. When women learn to economize their time, their steps, and work by careful thought, the drudgery of the household will be greatly lessened. How many trips are taken up and down stairs empty handed! how many careless things are done which result in hours of hard work! Anyone who has had experience with raw servants can easily appreciate the difference between the work of a capable woman and that of one with no mind to plan or execute. There is a still greater difference between an intelligent, careful housekeeper and one who takes no pains to inform herself about the best methods of doing the work in her house, and the best ways of planning and providing for it.

Precautions Against the Cholera.

Now, as always when the question arises as to the measures to be taken against an anticipated epidemic, the newspapers are dwelling on the matter of the filthy condition of the streets, and in this country and Great Britain the most prominent topic of inquiry in connection with the possible access of cholera is as to what sanitary condition various places would be found to be in should the disease visit them. It is all very well to attend to cleanliness, not only when an epidemic threatens, but at all times. But it is sheer folly to bring that consideration into the fore ground as being of the slightest avail under such circumstances as an impending invasion of cholera. Cholera undoubtedly runs riot in filth, but, unfortunately, it shows the same luxuriance in the cleanest of towns. The road to safety lies not in giving the disease a chilling reception on its arrival, but in not allowing it to arrive.

The deplorable feature in the tendency alluded to is the fact that it leads to neglect of the only measures that are of any real use. It even leads to depreciation of the value of quarantine measures. Public opinion, the utmost support of which is always needed in matters of sanitation, is thus lulled into indifference to the necessary restrictions on commerce, and fails to oppose the obstructiveness of trade. As the Nation lately remarked, quarantine may never yet have stopped the march of cholera. There is good reason to think, however, that it has. At all events, an extension of the quarantine idea is all we can depend upon to keep the disease at bay. It is, therefore, exceedingly satisfactory and reassuring to learn that our government, at the suggestion of the surgeon-general of the Marine hospital service, has telegraphed instructions to our consuls at British ports to take measures for the sanitary inspection of vessels bound for this country. Over and over again have epidemics stolen a march on those who were busy in pooh-poohing the possibility of their arrival. While, then, as has before been stated in this journal there is no present occasion for alarm, there is every occasion for vigilance.—New York Medical Journal.

Current Notes.

"Duden & Co." is the sign of an eastern firm. Every night the sign is covered with a wire screen to protect it from mutilation. "The boys try to make us a company of dues by removing the 'n,' said a member of the firm.

The cholera scare has stimulated the authorities of Vienna to unwonted activity in sanitary matters. Not only have they decided to take a number of measures of a precautionary nature, but they have published a long list of the most stringent regulations, to be carried out in case cholera should make its appearance in the capital.

It seems that the steps on the social ladder in Pennsylvania are as far apart as they are in England. A superintendent of a coal mine in Scranton refuses to recognize the marriage of his son—a minor—with a Lowell girl, because the latter is beneath her husband in station.

The officials charged with the management of the hospital of Paris at Loggerheads with the attending physicians about the value of beer as a medicine or an article of nutriment. The doctors insist that beer shall be retained in the list of articles furnished to the hospitals, and are sustained in this by the entire medical fraternity of the French capital. The managers of the hospitals however. have the disposal of the fund, and for the present beer is not among the things that they supply.

In quarrying sandstone in the yard of the state prison near Carson, Nevada, numerous footprints have been discovered. Some were made by an animal allied to the elephant; some resemble those of the horse and the deer; others were apparently made by a wolf. There were also tracks made by large birds, and some which bore a strong likeness to human footprints. Prof. Marsh, who has examined photographs and casts of them, is of the opinion, however, that the latter were made by large Edentates, and not by human beings.

Competition is necessary in the hotel and tavern business in the Yosemite Valley. A tourist, who is evidently an Englishman, writes to a New York paper to complain that he had to pay $3 for "French claret," which was neither French nor claret, 25 cents for blacking his boots, and had live on "sogged" potatoes and bad bread, "leathery" beef and vile coffee. When he remonstrated the hotel man replied: "Well, you need not expect to get every comfort when you come here." The hotel-keeper saw that the tourist was a "blarsted Britisher," and "socked it on to him," for such comforts as he enjoyed.

From statistics recently published it appears that there are in the world no fewer than 3,985 paper mills, producing every year 950,000 tons of paper from all kinds of substances, including rags, straw and alfalfa. About one half is printed upon, and of these four hundred seventy-six thousand tons of paper, nearly three hundred thousand tons are used by newspapers. The various Governments consume in official business 100,000 tons; schools, 90,000 tons: commerce, 120,000 tons; industry, 90,000 tons, and private correspondence another 90,000 tons. Including women and children, the paper trade employs 192,000 hands.

It is a wonderful fact that shipping, as old as civilization and once the great carrier of the world's commerce, has been far outstripped in its capitalized value by the railroad, an institution but little more than fifty years old. The value of British shipping is $1,000,000,000; value of British railroads, $3,700,000,000; value of American railroads, $6,300,000,000. Great Britain herself, the queen of marine commerce, finds her railroad investment to treble that in shipping, while our railroad plant nearly doubles in value that of the mother country.

Some of the scenes at the hotels in Bethlehem and Jefferson, at the White Mountains, during the stay of the hay fever patients in August are quite amusing. These unfortunates get together in knots, detail their symptoms and pass round for inspection and criticism the various medicines they use, unmindful of their poorer brethren in misery, who, not possessing money enough to migrate to the mountains, have to stay and snuff and cough it out at home.

Personal Mention.

Dr. Power, the pastor of the Garfield Memorial church at Washington, says there are more church members in political life than one is apt to think. The Dutch government have refused to grant the 30,009 guilders which Baron Nordenskjold claims as the discoverer of the northeast passage. The states general offered this award in 1596, but its motive was to find a passage of commercial value, while Nordenskjold has merely found a "scientific" one.

Captain Webb's death has brought out the statement that Boynton once conceived the plan of floating down the Niagara rapids in his rubber suit. But with more caution than Webb exhibited he marked and numbered several railroad ties and sent them afloat above the bridge. When they were recovered below the whirlpool and Boynton saw the ugly dents and scars upon them he wisely turned his back upon Niagara.

Captain John Ericsson, the inventor of naval engines of war, was eighty years old Tuesday. He lives in a plain dwelling house on Beach street, New York. Many telegrams of congratulations reached him, one from Sweden, where he was born. He works very hard, in spite of his years. He is constructing an engine for solar observations and is also trying to improve his new torpedo boat, the Destroyer.

Thirty years ago Louis Weber, a native of Wurtemberg, emigrated to America and settled as a farmer in Kentucky. Lately, having amassed a competency, he started for his native place, intending to visit his sister, who was the only surviving member of his family, and who had not seen him since he left home in his youth. He hoped to give her a joyful surprise, and looked forward with pleasant anticipation to the reunion. On arriving at his native village he learned that his sister had two days before been buried. The news unmanned him. He was taken sick, and a week after his sister's death was laid in a grave beside hers.

"I knew the Blair family well," says an old attache of the post office department to the Washington Star, "and used to go fishing with Frank and Jim. They were bad boys, as boys are, but Montgomery was always good. The neighbors sometimes used to go to Mr. Blair and complain about something that Frank or Jim had done. The old gentleman would say rather testily: 'Go to Mrs. Blair. They are her children, not mine.'"

The New York Evening Post, commenting on the suicide of Minister Barca, denies that Washington is a fast and expensive city, and says: "In fact, the social tone of Washington is very simple, unpretending, and unexacting compared with that of New York. There is infinitely less 'style' and display there than here. Although a large income will, of course, give certain advantages, there is probably no large city in the United States in which money, for its own sake, counts for as little as it does it Washington.

"Roscoe Conkling," says the Washington Critic, "when in the senate was regarded as the worst speller in that body. Senator Mitchell, of Oregon, was assigned to a seat directly behind Conkling, and soon the senator from New York, who had been busily engaged in writing, turned to him and said: 'Senator Mitchell, how would you spell "wagon?"' 'W-a-g-o-n,' said the Orgonian. 'Well,' said Mr. Conkling, 'I will immediately proceed to erase a "g." I spelled the word with "two g's."' On another occasion he asked Senator Mitchell how to spell czar, and being told, remarked: 'I have just spelled it "Z-a-r," so I will prefix the letter "C."' Many other eccentricities in spelling are told of Senator Conkling.

ARMING THE ENEMY.

The Way a Couple of Morgan's Guerallas Fooled Capt. Jackson.

St. Louis Republican.

Capt. George M. Jacksen, speaking of the Gen. John Morgan reunion, said to a Republican reporter that he couldn't help but think how he, a Union Captain, unwittingly helped to arm two companies of Morgan's regiment during the war. It happened in this way: "I," said the Captain, "volunteered in the Fourth Kentucky Union regiment, of which Fry, who killed Zollicoffer, was the Colonel. I was mustered in at 'Camp Dick Robinson,' and was elected Captain. I felt pretty large, wore the Captain's straps on my shoulder and a tall hat with a feather as large as life, being then but twenty years old. I asked and obtained a furlough to visit Cincinnati. There I met two old friends, named Cole and Kelly—the former now living at Tipton, Missouri. One of the boys asked me if I couldn't get them a permit to purchase a pistol and ammunition in the city, as they were not known in the city and desired me to certify that they were all right. I said there will be no trouble about it. I took them to the headquarters of Gen. Burnside, who was then in command, and the official who had the granting of permits. Seeing that I was sound, having a Union Captain's shoulder-straps on, and after showing them my furlough, he said, "I will give your friends permits to purchase all the pistols they need." which was done. I parted with Cole and Kelly, but on crossing the river I found they were carrying their carpet-sacks heavily loaded down. I asked what they had in there that was heavy, and they laughingly prevaricated, and I did not care to be too inquisitive. I subsequently learned that with their permits obtained as I have just stated, they made several trips to Cincinnati and procured 250 pistols, with the necessary caps and ammunition, with which they armed two full companies of John Morgan's brigade, of which they were members. I kept the matter to myself, and Burnside was never the wiser for it."

Learned Titles.

We have had great excitement about the refusal on the part of Harvard college to confer the title of LL. D. on Governor Butler of Massachusetts, thus turning aside from their usual custom. I think the whole land is more impressed than ever before with the fact that learned titles amount to very little anyhow. I never knew a legal gentleman helped in his profession by an LL D., or a clergyman by a D. D., or a philosopher by an F. R. S. Some of the unsuccessful lawyers of the land have the long collegiate appendage to their names, and they are ministers who do not know how to preach who are doctors of divinity. In this land it is becoming more and more of a question what a man is, and what a man can do, than what affixes and suffixes have gathered to his name. Last year, at the time of Harvard Commencement, I was in Boston, and saw a parade of soldiers, and heard a band of music, and was told it was the Lancers, in great flourish escorting the governor to Harvard college, where the degrees were to be bestowed. All Boston smiled at the time-honored imbecility, and if this year the habit of playing soldier-boy is broken up for all time, there will come a practical advantage out of the angry discussion as to whether Benjamin F. Butler ought to have conferred on him a title which he has already received from other colleges.—Dr. Talmage in Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine.

In a Plague-Stricken City.

There has been a grim fascination in the histories of these all-devouring pestilences, from the day of Deffoe downwards. It may, therefore, be interesting to recall some of the passages from 'Dothen' in which Mr. Kinglake gives a vivid picture of Cairo during the plague of 1847, "during the whole time of my stay in Cairo," he begins, "the plague was so master of the city, and stared so plain in every street and every alley, that I cannot now affect to dissociate the two ideas." When Mr. Kinglake arrived at Cairo (he rode in from the Desert in spite of friendly warnings) he found himself the only European traveler there. It was a bold undertaking voluntarily to take up his abode in that plague-stricken city, and during his stay he lived under perpetual apprehension, for even in sleep, he says, there remained with him some faint notion of the peril with which he was encompassed. Fear, he goes on to say, does not necessarily damp the spirits. "If I had not been surrounded at this time by new faces, new scenes, and new sounds, the effect produced upon my mind by one unceasing cause of alarm may have been different." As it was, "the eagerness with which I pursued my rambles among the wonders of Egypt was sharpened and increased by the sting of the fear of death." When he first arrived, the daily number of "accidents" by plague, out of a population of about 200,000, did not exceed four or five hundred, but before he went away (Mr. Kinglake spent eighteen days in the city) deaths were reckoned at twelve hundred a day. His quarters were in one of the chief thoroughfares of the city, and the funerals passed under his windows. These funerals were very simply conducted. The bier was a shallow wooden tray carried upon a light and weak wooden frame. The tray had in general no lid, but the body was more or less hidden from view by a shawl or a scarf. "I never observed any appearance of mourning in the mourners; the pace was too severe for any solemn affectation of grief." As the days passed the funerals became more frequent, until at last the passing of the howlers from morn to noon was almost incessant. "I believe that about one-half of the whole people was carried off by this visitation." The plague, however, was never allowed to interfere with the religious usages of the inhabitants. He rode one day round the great burial ground:

The ground, unlike the "Turkish cities of the dead," which are made so beautiful by their dark cypresses, has nothing to sweeten melancholy—nothing to mitigate the hatefulness of death. Carniverous beasts and birds possess the place by night, and now in the morning it was all alive with fresh comers—alive with dead. Yet at this very time when the plague was raging so furiously and on this very ground, which resounded so mournfully with the howls of arriving funerals, preparations were going on for the religious festival called the Kurban Bairam. Tents were pitched, and swings hung for the amusement of children—a ghastly holiday!"

The Mohammedans, it seems, refrain from approaching heaven with their complaints until the plague has endured for a long space. And then they pray God—not that the plague may cease—but that they may go to another city!

Those who believe in the efficacy of cordons and seclusion will appreciate Mr. Kinglake's account of his visit to his banker. He was a staunch believer in the fatal effects of contact:

"At his door several people were hanging about and keeping guard. At length I was conducted through the court and up a flight of stairs, and finally into the apartment where business was transacted. The room was divided by a good substantial fence of iron bars, and behind these defences the banker had his station. From fear of the plague he had put himself 'in strict quarantine.' I advanced to the iron fence, and, putting my letter between the bars, politely offered it to Mr. Banker. Mr. Banker received me with a sad and dejected look, and not with 'open arms,' but with a pair of tongs. I placed my letter between the iron fingers, these instantly picked it up as if it were a viper, and conveyed it away to be scorched and purified by smoke and fire.

But, alas! despite these ingenious contrivances for eluding Fate, the money-changer, "who had strived to guard the days of his life with bolts and bars of iron," was carried off by the plague.

Disgusted at such treatment, Mr. Kinglake courageously determined that the epidemic was not contagious, and that he could not be killed "by the touch of a woman's sleeve nor yet by her blessed breath." He altered none of his habits or amusements. He went hither and thither as the fit took him. To any one, however, holding the opinions of the unfortunate Levantine banker, "the narrow and crowded streets were as terrible as the easy slope that leads to Avernus."

To the contagionist, filled as he is with the dread of final causes, having no faith in destiny, and with none of the devil-may-care indifference which must stand him instead of creed, to such one every rag that shivers in the breeze of a plague-stricken city has a sort of sublimity. If by any terrible ordinance he be forced to venture forth, he sees Death dangling from every sleeve, and as he creeps forward he poises his shuddering limbs between the imminent jacket that is stabbing at his right elbow, and the murderous pelisse that threatens to mow him clean down as it sweeps along on his left. But most of all he dreads that which of all he should love—the touch of a woman's dress; for mothers and wives, hurrying forth on kindly errands from the bedside of the dying, go slouching along the streets more wilfully and less courteously than the men. Sooner or later the dreaded chance arrives. That bundle of linen, with the dark tearful eyes at the top of it—she has touched him with the hem of her sleeve, From that dread moment his peace is gone. His mind forever hanging upon the dreaded touch he fears, he watches for the symptoms so carefully that sooner or later they come in truth. The parched mouth is a sign—his mouth is parched; the throbbing brain—his brain throbs; the rapid pulse—he touches his wrist and feels how his frightened blood goes galloping to his heart. So he does for himself the work of the plague. There's the devil to pay in his brain, and perhaps the next night but one he becomes the "life and soul" of some squalling jackal family, who fish him out by the foot from his shallow and sandy grave.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The History of Lace.

From the Philadelphia Record.

In the use of lace as an adornment women have been more faithful to their early tastes than men, for up to the beginning of the present century it was much worn by men as women. Henry III covered himself with fine lace in gold, and the Valois used it profusely, Bossompiere, Cinq. Mars, and other leaders of fashion at the court of Henry III brought the extravagant use of lace to a climax. When gentlemen wore it as a decoration they adorned their gloves, falling collars, ruffs, and dresses with it in abundance. Some, indeed, wore a rosette of it on their gaiters, a bow of it on their high top boots, and it was covered into fancy buckles for low shoes. It has from early date been used on the covering of chalice altar cloths, and decorated the priest's alb and the prelate's rochet. Mrs. Bury Palliser speaks of the high esteem in which the church held lace, and of celebrated painters furnishing designs for biblical pictures in which we see the mother, in anticipation of the return of the prodigal son, preparing him for a tippet trimmed with the richest point; the foolish virgins weeping with handkerchiefs bordered with it; the table-cloth of Dives, as well as the table-napkin used by his guest, ornamented in the same manner.

Laces made for women's use were formerly designated for each change of the season, for different hours of the day, and adapted to all ages. Under Louis XV point d'Alencon and point d'Argenian, etiquette styled "winter laces," and even now ladies have little discernment who cannot distinguish appropriate laces for morning or evening wear. Valenciennes, with its clear ground work is particularly adapted to handsome morning toilets. Narrow edgings are for linen suitings, and torchon for those seaside costumes that in elegant material ape the blue garb of the French peasant. Lace, properly considered, indicates by its transparent thick or smooth points, or those in relief, the difference between the frivolous and sedate, and suggests the appropriateness of such as should decorate promenade dresses, visiting costumes, or regatta or race toilets.

Great antiquity is claimed by many for the origin of lace. Yet an inconsistency is apparent, for if these eastern nations had manufactured lace for several centuries before it was known in Europe why did they so strictly keep the secret? Then again, these people, since the commencement of their history have carefully preserved their methods of dress, habits and industrial arts. The first lace which the earliest engraved patterns display was guipuire, and came to us from Venice. There is but little reason for doubting that the origin of lace is purely Italian. The Venetians used ornaments in high relief on their guipires, and so adroitly did they study the effect of light and shade that shadows changed from dark to light at each movement of the wearer.

In Queen Charlotte's time the English had a piece of lace manufactured in point d'Angleterre, and presented it to her which had for design the destruction of the invincible armada by Elizabeth's fleet. It shows men of war bending before the wind, dolphins nearly as large as the ships, forts, groups of weapons and flags reproduced with great fidelity. The point d'Alencon, made with a needle, is acknowledged by all connoisseurs to be the richest and most beautiful of all laces. Elegant and fine, made entirely of linen thread, it has raised figures for ornaments.

Long after hand-made laces had enjoyed a life of popularity, mechanism invaded the domain of lace-making. Tulle was the first lace so made. Many unsuccessful efforts were made, which finally culminated; toward the end of the last century, in the bobbin loom. From this invention immense machines, moved by steam, weave upward of 16,000 meshes per minute, while a lace-maker, on an average can produce but five or six meshes in the same time. Those wearing expensive hand-made lace can scarcely realize labor employed in its manufacture. In traveling through Flanders, Norway or Auvergne, one often sees a ground floor filled with young girls, bending over their cushions, wielding innumerable bobbins around innumerable pins twisting, crossing, interlacing them, without a single mistake; in a word, making nearly 152,000 evolutions, for a design of ten inches, amounting to twenty-seven movements in a minute.

Bossompiere says that the baptism of the royal children of France in 1 606, when extravagance ran riot, cost him 7000 crowns. The lace, which was manufactured for the occasion, was of exquiste texture, and had sewn on it fifty pounds weight of pearl. Gabrielle D,Estess in 1594 ordered a lace hankerchief made for her, the price being 150 crowns. Mary of Medici made the Medicis supplant the French ruff after her arrival at the French capital. It was composed of lovely lace, and on account of its abrupt rise of twelve inches at the back of the neck had to be supported on wire.

The Western Woman in Boston.

She has arrived. She has come for material. Boston is her clover-field from which she gathers the elements of the honey which sweetens life during the ten months of the year that she does not live in Boston. When the western woman arrives she selects a quiet boarding place whose essentials to her are that it be within easy walking access of the Common and the Gardens, of the Museum of Fine Arts and Public Library. Usually she has a friend at court who introduces her at the venerated and venerable Athenæum, which at once becomes her special enthusiasm and the pro tem. center of her universe. The Western woman will know more about Boston in a week historically considered than many who lived a lifetime under the shadow of the Gilded Dome. She makes a pilgrimage to Bunker Hill and energetically climbs the monument. She passes a day in the quiet shades of Mount Auburn. She spends long and lovely mornings in the Harvard College Library. She walks in the Public Garden in that enchanted hour when the electric light flames forth in its white brilliancy against the sunset glow that burns low in the west. She finds out what the Woman's Union is doing, and notes plans and projects for future meditation. She goes to the Concord School of Philosophy, not to attempt a weak imitation of funny sayings about it, but to catch its real significance and enter into the modern spirit of metaphysical research. She touches a great many aggregations of pretension and sham with that little divining rod of hers, and intelligent study has given her something of the assayer's power—mentally—to discriminate between the true gold and alloy of life. She remarks that the annual statement regarding the 60,000 superfluous women of Massachusetts is again making its summer tour in the newspapers, and she scrutinizes society a little to see where the 60,000 "superfluous" are. In writing to a Western journal she naively observes that they all seem to be closely occupied in furthering and supplementing the work of the male majority.

The Bostonian par excellence is apt of late to be a little at fault in her estimate of the western women. Having entertained a misty idea that the west was in a state of semi-barbarism, she is surprised to perceive how easily, even gracefully the western woman wears the usual costumes of private life, and appears to be familiar with the ordinary amenities of society. "Mary X. is really very nice," patronizingly remarks Lady Clara Vere de Vere. "Indeed I should scarcely know from her accent that she was not a New England woman." This languid declaration is intended as a high social compliment. Does the western wanderer appreciate its force? It is feared not. Her own standard of education and ideals of life being similar to those of progressive life anywhere else, she is both amused and amazed that she is regarded with compassionate approval through the eyeglasses of a Lady Vere de Vere. The keenest comedy of the day is the idea of the west held by the Boston woman who has never left her native New England. knowledge, whether literary or social, is supposed by this order of women to be purely regulated by geographical boundaries. An amusing instance of this was that of a Boston woman who, in writing of travelers' customs stated that "western people always folded their napkins at a hotel table with scrupulous care." With equal truth she might have predicted that western people ate with their knives or read the morning paper in church, or promenaded the streets bareheaded. The idea of making good breeding a thing defined by the isothermal lines is absurd enough for a first class comedy. There are plenty of Western people who are ill-bred. There are an abundance of eastern people who are also ill-bred, but the cause in this place lies deeper than in the longitude. The western woman finds it a condensed inspiration for the year to pass the summer here, and with her well-grounded intelligence, her strength and clean intellectual discrimination, her spontaneity and receptivity to ideas; in the power to transmit these ideas into outward work and realize them in actually living,—in all this, she perhaps brings to the east as much, even, as she takes from its historic stores of wisdom and culture.

EDGEWOOD'S EMPTY HALLS

Mrs. Kate Chase Leaves Her Fine Mansion Tenantless for Five Years.

Washington Letter in the Baltimore American.

"Edgewood," as it is called, is tenantless, while its owner roams in Europe. She left here a little over a month ago, with her children, for a five years tour abroad. The grounds are kept in tolerable order by the faithful servant in whose charge they were left by her. But the great house, with its rich furnishings, stands precisely as she left it, and the broad acres of the magnificent estate lie uncultivated. It is a characteristic Southern mansion, set in the magnificent forest which enriches the hills north of the city. From the broad verandas which grace the front of the building the visitor looks through an opening in the woods down upon the city of Washington, with the white dome of the Capitol gleaming in the sunshine or the mellow moonlight, as the case may be, all making a beautiful picture.

"How is it?" was asked of this friend of the fair proprietress, "that this fair estate was left idle?" "That," was the reply, "is what no one knows. Certainly Mrs. Chase is not so well off financially as to be able to throw away such a place. She is, however, a very peculiar woman, and if she can't get what she wants for it she is not likely to let it go at all. She has been offered $150 a month, and unless she gets that prefers to let it stand idle. Queer? Well, it's about on a par with most of her performances. Now, here's an estate worth $30,000—she has been offered that for it—and yet she will not make any use of it. Why, she wouldn't allow it tilled when she lived here. She kept two or three men employed in keeping it in order, but wouldn't allow the ground tilled. The place brought her in debt every year. The taxes are something enormous."

"But," suggested the correspondent, "it has been stated that congress has relieved the estate from taxation." "That," continued the gentleman referred to, "is like many other things that have been said about this family. It is only partly true. Congress did relieve it from certain taxes, but those were from back taxes altogether. The place, you know, belonged to her father. He bought it long before the war. After his death it was found that some $20,000 taxes were due and unpaid on it. Well, Kate was pretty shrewd. She knew her power and how to make use of it to advantage. She proposed to the other heirs that she would take the estate just as it stood, providing for the taxes herself, giving up to them, I suppose, a certain part of the other property. They agreed to that. The property was transferred to her, in her own name, and after a while a little bill made its appearance in congress remitting the taxes then due. That, however, does not effect it now."

The old servant now in charge tells many stories illustrating the peculiarities of the mistress. She wouldn't let him plant cabbage anywhere near the house, because she could "smell 'em" Last spring she engaged a man at a very high price and set him to ploughing up the fields. She said she was going to make the land of some use to her. But, bless you, he hadn't got it ploughed before she called him in one day and told him to stop all work on it, that she was going to Europe, to be absent five years.

The Song of the Mates.

For five long hours, as the boat finished her loading at Vicksburg, the first mate kept up a monotonous:

"Hi! there, nigger! Nigger, what you doing? Out of that gangway, nigger. Pass along! Pass along! Up that gang plank! Hi! there, nigger!"

And for five long hours the second mate stood at the boat end of the gang-plank and sung out to the long, dark line carrying sacks of cotten seed meal:

"Cross over—down this side! Cross over—down this side! Come along nigger—down this side! Oh! there, Ephraim, cross over!"

And for five mortal hours a sort of third mate was stationed in the starboard gangway, and he drawled out:

"Out o' that gangway, nigger! Walk right up, Charles Henry! G'way from that waterpail, you black rascal! Out o' that gangway, scorpions! Bring along them sack, you niggers!"

And for five never-ending hours another mate of some sort gravitated between the warehouse and the boat, and kept shouting:

"Now, you niggers, pass along! Now, you niggers, pass along! You, there, Abraham, pass along! You, there, William, work your wings! Pass along! Pass along! All you niggers, pass along!"

After the steamer pulled out I went down among the crew and asked one of them why it was that such proceedings were deemed necessary while loading or unloading.

"Wall, boss," he answered, as he finished swallowing a pint of river water, "dey say dat a boat once run up an' down de ribber wid a captain who didn't drink, mates who didn't sw'ar, an' a crew dat worked like cats an' didn't need no orders. She loaded heah fur Orleans, an' got dar, an' she took on a load fur up ribber an' busted her bilers at Nachez an' killed ebery soul aboord. I spects de ole way am de safest way."

"But don't you know enough to shoulder a sack and bring it aboard!"

"Sart'n."

"And can't you do it without being called a scorpion?"

"Sartin! but dar's de mates. S'pose Ize gwine to git up a kick an' frow all de mates outer work an' let deir poor wives an' chil'en suffer wid poverty? No, sah—I'ze no sich man. Dem mates am hired to cuss an' call names, an' hit us wid bar'l hoops an' rush us up an' down an' I-isn't gwine to raise a fuss an' git him discharged. Dey has got to have a chance same us, an' I ain't a bit down on 'em case dey happen to be bo'n white. If I—"

"Now niggers, move this bacon!" suddenly called the second mate, and as the dusky crew gathered round him he began to sing:

"All you niggers grab a chunk! Lift 'em up—walk along—drop 'em down—all you sinners pass along!"—Detroit Free Press.

A BRAVE BOY.

A Lesson to Fathers and Mothers.

"I'll just go down by the lake, mamma and wait until you are ready."

"But, Rollo, remember you are dressed in white, and it soils very easily; do not go where you will get any stains."

"I won't, mamma, I'll be ever so careful."

This was the talk they had as Rollo, in his newest white suit, and brilliant red stockings and fresh sailor hat, kissed his hand to his mother and tripped out of the gate. Ten minutes more he expected to be off to the park to hear the lovely music, and see the swans and monkeys.

It was less than ten minutes when he came back, one shoe off, one elastic gone, his bright red stockings torn and hanging, himself covered from head to foot with mud. How could a boy have done so much mischief to himself in so short a time! If only Rollo had had a reputation for being careful, she would have surely stopped to hear his story; but, alas for him! A more heedless boy never lived than this same Rollo. Still, this was worse than usual; so much worse that the mother decided on the instant that he must have a severe lesson.

"Rollo," she said in her coldest tone, "you may go at once to Hannah and have her put your every-day suit on; then you may go to my room and stay until I return."

"But, mamma," said Rollo, his face in a quiver, his lips trembling so that he could hardly speak.

But she passed him on the stairs without a word.

He called after her.

"Mamma, oh, mamma! Won't you listen to me?"

Then she said:

"Rollo, you may obey me immediately, and I do not wish to hear a word."

In a few minutes after the carriage rolled away, stopped at Mrs. Merrivale's and took up Helen and her mother, then on to the park.

You needn't suppose Rollo's mother enjoyed it. She seemed to care nothing for the park; she hardly glanced at the swans, and did not go near the monkeys. All the time she missed a happy little face and eager voice that she had expected to have with her. Miss Helen Merrivale was another disappointed one. Had not she and Rollo planned together this ride to the park? Now, all she could learn from his mother was that Rollo was detained at the last minute. She did not intend to tell the Merrivales that her careless little boy seemed to grow more careless every day; and how she felt that she must shut her ears to his pitiful little explanations, which would amount to nothing more than he "didn't mean to at all," and was "so sorry."

The mother believed that she had done right, nevertheless she was lonely and sad. They came home earlier than they had intended. As they passed Mrs. Sullivan's pretty cottage she was standing at the gate with Mamie in her arms, and out she came to speak to them.

"You haven't the dear little fellow with you," she said eagerly, her lips trembling. "I wanted to kiss him, the darling brave boy. O, Mrs. Gray, I hope and trust that he did not get hurt in any way?"

"Who?" said Mrs Gray, wonderingly. "My Rollo! Oh, no, he isn't hurt. Why? Did you hear of an accident?"

"Did he tell you? Didn't any body tell you? Why, Mrs. Gray, if it hadn't been for your brave little Rollo—I shiver and grow cold all over when I think where my baby would be now! She climbed into the boat; it was locked, but she tried to sit down at the farther end, and lost her balance and pitched head first into the lake. Rollo saw her, your little Rollo, he was the only one around; and I don't know how he did it, and he such a little bit of a fellow. He climbed over the side of the boat and reached after her; he stepped right in that deep mud and got stuck, and the little man had sense enough to unbutton his shoe and leave it sticking there and wade out after baby. He saved her, I'm sure I don't know how, nobody seems to know, but he tugged her out and laid her on the bank, all unconscious, you know, and we thought she was dead, but she is as well as ever, and oh, Mrs. Gray, isn't there anything I can do for the blessed boy."

"John," said Mas. Gray, "drive home as fast as possible."

Up the steps she ran, gave the bell a furious pull, and dashed past the little nurse girl to her own room like a comet.

"Where is Rollo?" she asked breathlessly of Hannah.

"He is asleep now, ma'am. He cried as though his heart would break, and was a long time getting comforted, but finally I got him dressed and coaxed him to take a nap, and there's been half the town here this afternoon to inquire how he is."

She didn't believe in disturbing sleeping boys as a rule, but she picked this one right out of his bed and carried him, half smothered with kisses, to her rocking chair and sat down to laugh and cry over him and kiss him. Only half awake he was at last, still grasping the big orange that Hannah had given him, when mamma, giving him more kisses, said:

"Dear litle brave boy, will you forgive mamma for all the sorrow of this afternoon?"

Then he rubbed his eyes and looked at her wonderingly and patted her cheek, and said:

"You mean you will forgive me? You will, won't you? I truly didn't mean to get wet and dirty."

How many kisses do you suppose he had then? As for Mrs. Sullivan, she hasn't found enough yet to do for Rollo, though she keeps doing nice little things all the time.—The Pansy.

PARODIES ON ART.

The Most Magnificent Building in the World Filled With Bad Pictures and Worse Statues.

Cleveland Leader's Washington Letter.

Our National Capitol has no superior, travelers say, in the world for beauty of position and architectural grandeur. seated on a hill on the banks of the Potomac, surrounded by a rolling country of picturesque scenery, it has the combinations of nature's art added to the best of man's skill to make it beautiful. Capitol Hill is ninety feet higher than the capitol itself, measuring from the top of the Indian girl who poses as a figure of Justice on its dome and rises 287 feet above this, has an elevation above the surrounding country of 377 feet. Every one knows how the outside of the capitol looks, but few appreciate its dimensions. It covers three and a half acres of ground, and is 751 feet long and 324 feet wide. It is built of marble and sandstone, but the sandstone which was first used has been painted white, and the whole looks like an immense pile of marble. The iron dome is of the same glittering white—it is also painted. This building has already cost $13,000,000. The furniture and other things in the interior will run this estimate into several hundred thousand more. In general, the expenditures have been very well made. But not always so.

Greenough's statue of Washington, which stands in front of the Capitol, is a parody on art and also a parody on the man it is intended to represent. Still it ought to be good. Why? It cost, all told, about $43,000. But it is not good. It represents the father of his country sitting as naked as Adam on a Roman chair, holding one hand in the air and a sword in the other. Allen G. Thurman, in looking at it one cold day, said: "See poor naked George Washington. He is cold to-day, and he is pointing with that uplifted hand toward his clothes, which you know are in the Patent Office, and mutely asking for them." Still it cost $43,000. Better sculptors would have made him and have thrown in the clothes for half the money. It is so with the most of the pictures throughout the Capitol. The American nation is mighty smart, as our countrymen say abroad, but it generally gets cheated on its art purchases.

The pictures of the rotunda look as though they had been done by some house painter. Still they cost a small fortune—only $79,000. They were nearly ruined of late by the Garfield fair, but Congress made an appropriation of $2,500 to have them repaired, and a man is working at them in a little pen in the rotunda to-day. I called on the artist as I was passing through. He was carefully removing the pictures from their canvasses and transferring them to others—new canvasses. He pointed out some peculiarities in their damaged condition which seemed very strange. Said he: "See the cracks in that picture," pointing to one that looked as though it had been scratched with a rake, "those cracks all correspond to cracks on the wall behind the picture. The painting does not touch the wall, and it is very strange that the two coincide. It is so with all the pictures here." "Did you ever notice," he continued, "that these historical pictures are historically incorrect?"

"No," said I. "How so?"

"In many respects. Here, for instance in this "Landing of the Pilgrims." Look at that portrait of Miles Standish. Standish was, you know, a man very short in stature. This picture represents life-size, but if you will take measurements of that portrait you will find Standish here is a giant of over eight feet.

"This is only in one instance, There are numbers of inaccuracies in nearly every protrait in this room. Still some of these pictures are valuable. But it is rather as containing portraits of the statesmen of the days past than as works of art. The pictures of signers of the Declaration of Independance contains portraits of nearly every one of them, and these, in some cases, are the only ones on record."

"Did you ever hear," said I, "how that picture came to be called the shin picture?"

"No," replied the artist.

"It came," said I, "from those little tables placed in front of every man in the front row. When Trumbull finished the picture and handed it over to Congress, those men were all represented as sitting with their legs crossed over their knees, and their shins, clad in the knee-breeches of the time, facing the Speaker. A great deal of fun was made over it, and John Randolph dubbed it as the shin picture. The ridicule became at last so great that Congress passed an act ordering the artist to put tables in front of the men to relieve the stiffness of the picture. This was done, and that is how those tables came to be there to-day."

Every day crowds of visitors stand admiringly before these paintings in the rotunda, or go into ecstacies over the poorly-executed statues of Vinnie Ream and others scattered through the Capitol. They pass without seeing many of the really great beauties of the building. The dome itself, for instance, is the finest piece of iron work in the world. The bronze doors, by Rogers & Crawford, have not their equals in this country, and they will compare favorably with any of the works of Europe, except those wonderful doors in the baptistry at Florence, which Ghiberty made hundreds of years ago, and which Michæl Angelo said were fit to be the gates of Paradise. The Rogers door was modeled in Rome and cast in Munich. It contains eight panels in alto-relievo, illustrating the life of Colombus and the discovery of America. It is a wonderful work of art, and like the other, the bronze door of the Senate, one can hardly conceive how it can be so delicately made. The Rogers door weighs 20,000 pounds, it is seventeen feet high and nine feet wide and its cost was over $30,000.

The Crawford door is on the Senate portico. It was modeled by Crawford and was made in Massachusetts. Its cost was over $50,000 or more than $20,000 more for the privileges of having it made in this country. The door represents revolutionary and federal history scenes, one side being devoted to views of the revolution and the other to representations of the glories of peace. It is considered a work of great artistic merit.

Brumidi's painting with the canopy of the dome cost about $40,000. Standing in the rotunda below, you may look at them until your neck seems ready to break, and still experience pleasure. Imagine the half of a great ball over fifty feet in diameter, the inside of which is filled with beautiful paintings covering an area of 4,684 square feet. Just below this is a great belt nine feet high running around the whole length of the rotunda, and now surrounded with a scaffolding upon which the painters are working. The series of sketches are also by Brumidi, although the man died before he could complete them himself. His sketch-book, however, remains, and from this the paintings which he designed are being put upon the walls. It is nearly completed now, and one can see the daily progress toward the end. The sketches are historical.

The first tall figure in America, armed with sword and shield, with the eagle at her feet. On her right hand sits an American Indian with bow an arrows, and on her left side sits the genius of history sketching the march of American progress. There are fifteen other such scenes—the landing of Columbus, Cortez entering the Temple of the Sun in Mexico, Pizarro on horseback conquering Peru, the burial of De Soto in the Mississippi, John Smith and Pocahontas, the Landing of the Pilgrims, Penn's treaty with the Indians, industry in New England, Gen. Oglethrop and the Muscogee chief, the battle of Lexington, Declaration of Independence surrender of Cornwallis, the death of Tecumseh, the American army entering the City of Mexico, and a group of goldminers at work in California. These paintings are being finely executed, and from the rotunda they look as though they were stucco rather than fresco. Their estimated cost is $10,000.

The Plague of History.

The threatening cholera epidemic has called attention to the great plagues recorded in history, and a glance at some of the events may reconcile us to a grateful feeling from the comparative freedom from pestilence in late years. The earliest plagues of which there are any account are those described in Exodus, occurred in Egypt 1491 B. C. In 534 B. C., there was a plague at Carthage so terrible that parents sacrificed their children to propitiate the gods. In 187 B. C., in the Greek islands, Egypt and Syria, people died at the rate of 2,000 a day. In Rome, A. D. 80, 10,000 persons died daily. Another plague at Rome, A. D., 256, took off 5,000 a day, In 430 Britain was scourged so that the living were hardly able to bury the dead. During the years 746-749 Constantinople lost 200,000 of its population. At Chichester, England, in 772, 34,000 people died, and in 954, Scotland lost 40,000 people. Ireland was sorely visited in 1172 and 1204, and again in 1348-9. At that time 200 were buried daily in London. In 1407 London lost 30,000 citizens. There was a fearful pestilence in Oxford in 1471. The dreadful "sweating sickness" occurred in London in 1506 and again in 1517. In most of the towns half the people died, and Oxford was depopulated. In 1522 thousands were swept away in Limerick, The sweating sickness revisited England in 1528, and again in 1551. In 1603-04 30,578 people perished of plague in London. Constantinople again lost 200,000 people in 1611. In 1625 London lost 35,417 inhabitants. In 1632 Lyons lost 60,000. In 1656 400,000 people died at Naples in six months. In 1664 London's great plague took off 68,596 inhabitants. In 1720 60,000 people died at Marseilles. In 1773 80,000 inhabitants of Bossora, Persia, died of plague. In 1792 800,000 persons died of plague in Egypt. In Barbary 3,000 people died daily, and in 1779 247,000 people perished at Fez. Asiatic cholera first appeared in England at Sutherland, October 26, 1831, and in North America at Quebec, June 8, 1832, and in New York June 22, 1832. It revisited the United States in 1834, slightly in 1849, severely in 1855, and again lightly in 1866-57. In 1829-39 900,000 people died of cholera in Russia and Germany. In 1848-49 53,293 people died of it in England and Wales, and in 1854 these countries lost 20,097 and Naples 10,000 persons. In 1865 50,000 people died of cholera at Constantinople.—Inter-Ocean.

The Multicharge Gun.

New York Tribune's Reading Special.

What is intended to be one of the greatest improvements in modern warfare is the Lyford-Haskell multicharge gun, which was finished at the Scott foundery in New York recently. It has been undergoing construction for over two years, and has been shipped to Sandy Hook. There it will be tested in the presence of leading officers of the army and navy of the United States and foreign countries. The last congress made a special appropriation for this purpose. Since the invention of cannon, four hundred years ago, they have all been constructed on the same principle, that of containing all the powder in the breech, and the Lyford-Haskell has the first deviation. The weapon underneath contains four pockets which each hold twenty-eight pounds of powder, while the breech itself only eighteen pounds. As the projectile starts from the breech the force of this entire one hundred pounds of powder is concentrated on it, one pocket after another rapidly discharging its contents. The gun is twenty-five feet long and weighs twenty-five tons. It is rendered doubly strong by a steel lining, and it is thought can send a projectile through a solid piece of iron twenty-four inches thick. It will shoot from twelve to fifteen miles, and is intended for both harbor and naval defense.

The present gun was manufactured at a cost of over fifty thousand dollars, and Mr. Haskins has personally supervised its construction. The projectiles with which it is loaded weigh from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pounds each. A company with a capital of ten million dollars has been organized for the manufacture of the gun. Ex-Gov. Cornell, ex-Senator Platt and ex-Insurance Commissioner John F. Smythe, of New York, are interested in the company.

One of Sothern's Characteristic Jokers.

A story about "Lord Dundreary." As we all know, he was a great practical joker on or off the stage, here or in England. One night he arranged with his brilliant manager, Goodwin, while he was playing at the Globe Theater, Boston, that at a certain point in the performance Goodwin should interrupt him, pronounce him a humbug as a humorist and a stick as an actor, and that much brilliant repartee should flow therefrom, to the mystification of the audience and the amusement of Messrs. Sothern and Goodwin. Goodwin partook heartily of the spirit of the joke, and at the proper moment, dressed in full evening costume and somewhat disguised, he rose in one of the stage boxes, interrupted Sothern, called him a delusion and a snare, and wanted him to stop right there. Sothern, who enjoyed it even more than Goodwin, talked back smartly, and a rattling controversy followed in which Sothern evidently had the sympathy of the audience. Imagine the latter's delight and Goodwin's astonishment when a policeman, who was not in Goodwin's half of the joke, marched in under secret orders from Sothern and removed the disorderly gentleman from the box, from the house and to the police station, amid the cheers of the crowd. Some time after midnight Sothern visited the station and had his now disgruntled accomplice liberated.—[Philadelphia Record.

A Fine Counterfeit.

A remarkable counterfeit coin has been submitted by the secret service division to the superintendent of the Philadelphia mint. It is a $5 gold piece, and the report upon it states that it is 832-1000 fine, the standard for coin being 900-1000 fine. The coin, which is considerably worn and abraded, is now worth 463 cents. As far as can be judged it has been a piece of remarkably fine counterfeiting—the finest, in fact, that has ever come into the hands of the treasury officials. It is believed to be a relic of the early mining days of California, when bars of pure, or nearly pure, gold were made by the various mints on the Pacific coast and freely circulated. In those days the secret service was in an undeveloped condition, but since nearly all of those pure metal counterfeits have been seized or used by jewelers.

"TELL YOUR FORTUNE, DAINTY MAID?"

Tell your fortune, dainty maid?
Hard to please—I'm much afraid—
Snowy petals—finger tips—
Sparkling eyes and pouting lips—
Golden daisy, bright-arrayed.

"One, I love," is first betrayed;
"Two, he loves"—are you dismayed?
Can that word which from you slips
Tell your fortune?

Care and sorrow, long delayed,
Joy and mirth—the saucy jade—
Every god that nectar sips,
Every grace that dainty trips—
Yours. Could I—then thrice repaid—
Tell your fortune?

THE ROMANCE OF PUMP COURT.

THERE IS NO LIMIT TO A WOMAN'S EXPECTATIONS.

"Ralph Oldcastle is overdoing it. He'll break down," one barrister remarked to another, as the tall, gaunt form of a well-known Q. C. passed out of the Temple. "He works all day and writes all night, and no man can stand that sort of thing very long. He looks positively ill to-day."

"No wonder. I haven't known him to take a holiday for fifteen years; if he don't take care he'll 'cave' suddenly. It's a mistake for a man to pursue two professions when he can live comfortably by either;" and the speaker sighed regretfully. "Besides, Oldcastle is a rich man, he has no need to work at all, and, as a matter of course, every good thing falls in his way. I hear he's retained in the great Clifton swindling case."

"Yes, he's certainly lucky; but he's uncommonly sharp, too. However, judging by his appearance to-day, he won't last long—he's breaking fast—fast," and the speakers, who had been standing under the Temple gateway from a heavy shower, nodded complacently and went their several ways; the removal of even one successful man from among them would give each a chance of filling his place.

Ralph Oldcastle meantime walked hurriedly cityward, unmindful of the drenching rain. At the top of Ludgate hill he wheeled around suddenly and walked back again—a tall man, round-shouldered and gaunt, with thin, straggly gray hair and bright deep-set eyes; a keen, honest, repellant man, with a hard mouth, that never smiled. He was intensely respectable and respected, but he had few friends and fewer acquaintances, and no amiable weaknesses. He was charitable, never behind in subscribing to legitimate "relief" funds, never refusing a donation when demanded in due and proper form; but no one ever saw him buy a penny flower in the street, or a "fifth-edition special" of an evening paper. He never went home encumbered with useless "notions" or "novelties."

Stock brokers and bankers might purchase dancing dolls and terra-cotta monstrosities, live mice and patent purses, as every one knows they do, else why should the vendors of such wares multiply and flourish outside the stock exchange and the bank. Ralph Oldcastle never even cast a passing glance at such trumpery, nor was he ever seen with a bass basket containing fish or fruit, or a fern in a pot. He never thought of such things, never carried loose pennies in his overcoat pocket for emergencies, never overpaid a cabby—in short, he had no visible weaknesses at all. His inner life was as hard, cold and unsympathetic as his exterior.

He had chambers in Pump court, close to where "a white stone flashes over Goldsmith's ashes"—a stone white no longer, but smirched and stained with the grime of the city—but the lawyer never gave it a passing glance. Had you mentioned the name he would possibly have turned to the Law List to see who Oliver Goldsmith was.

Returning from his hurried, aimless walk up and down Fleet street, Ralph Oldcastle entered his sitting room and rang a bell. It was answered by a slim, dark-eyed, obsequious youth, whose history was a romance. Born in vice, cradled and nurtured in iniquity, educated among a gang of thieves, he miraculously escaped being either a house-breaker or convict. Oldcastle picked him up one day (when his heart was softer), fed him, clothed him, took him into his service, expected nothing in return, and was paid by the warmest gratitude and esteem. Edward Little could not love his master, but he nearly worshiped him. He had served him faithfully for seven years, and would serve him to his life's end. The lawyer smiled grimly. He did not believe in gratitude; and some day, when it suited him, Little would turn round and rend him. "But he cannot hurt me," he said to himself, with his hard, dry laugh. "No one can do that now. I've given Little nothing but the bread he has earned. I expect nothing in return." The dark-eyed clerk looked at his master attentively, and waited his orders in silence. "I shall be occupied all the afternoon, Edward; do not allow me to be disturbed on any pretense whatever," he said, shortly, and Edward withdrew puzzled, but silent. He never answered his master; no one did.

Left alone the lawyer sat at his writing table and took a letter from his pocket. After a few moments' hesitation he read it, reluctantly, as if it was a thing he was constrained to do in spite of himself; then he smoothed it out carefully on his table, and selecting a key from one of the drawers, unlocked the bureau, and from a secret receptacle drew forth a packet of letters and laid them beside that other on the table—still, as a man acting in spite of himself. His face was horribly pale, his eyes flashed and sparkled in their sunken sockets, and his hands, slight and white with well-tended nails, quivered nervously. One by one he read the letters over—and there were many of them—once or twice he laughed savagely at some expression; and when he had got through them he pushed them aside with a scowl. "Twenty years have I waited for this—lived for it, worked for it, hoped for it! I knew it would come, and it has," he said, aloud; "now, to make the most of it."

For a long time Ralph Oldcastle sat silent, regarding the correspondence before him. On the right two dozen of loose letters, written in a slender, girlish hand and overflowing with girlish expressions of unalterable love and undying devotion, beginning: "My own dearest Ralph," ending "your ever loving Connie." On the left a blurred and blotted note, containing a few lines in a woman's hand, heavy with sorrow and suffering. "Dear Mr. Oldcastle, I am in sore distress; I know no one in the wide world to turn to for advice and assistance save you. I wronged you once, but, heaven knows, I have been bitterly punished—all my life. Will you help me for Auld Lang Syne? You were my husband's friend, and something more than mine. We are both friendless and helpless now, and have only you to turn to—Constance Wilton." "I wonder if she has been as constant to him as she has been to me," Mr. Oldcastle said, as he locked up the letters. "I wonder if she has smiled on him with that tender trustfulness she practiced on me; I wonder if she softened his heart and turned his head with her witcheries and then drove him mad by her coldness; sent him to the devil by her heartlessness, as she might have sent me, had I not been made of sterner stuff than most men. I wonder what she expects me to do for Henry Wilton, the friend whom I loved and trusted, and who repaid me by treachery and deceit; I wonder what, in reason and common justice, she expects me to do for him. But there is no limit to a woman's expectations, and she knows nothing of reason, and less of justice. However, let her come and see me by all means, and tell me her history. It cannot fail to be interesting to me, after waiting twenty years for it. Oh, yes, I will hear the history of Constance and Henry Wilton by all means, and try to forget that she was once my promised wife and he my dearest friend, and that both played me false. It is perfectly true that everything comes to him who knows how to wait, and revenge is not the worst thing in life worth waiting for."

Hard, stern, uncompromising, was Ralph Oldcastle's face, as he wrote a few lines on half a sheet of paper:

"If Mrs. Wilton will call on Mr. Oldcastle at 3 o'clock on Monday, he will be pleased to learn in what way he can be of service to her."

That was all he said, and he smiled with almost fiendish malignity as he thought how it would mislead her; yes, he would be pleased enough to know how he could help her, but knowing how, would he do it, was a more doubtful matter. If a man like Ralph Oldcastle waits twenty years for revenge for a real or imaginary injury, he is not going to forego it at a moment's notice. It was foolish of Constance Wilton to appeal to him for auld lang syne, for the memory of those days was still sore in his heart.

"CONNIE, UNALTERED BY TIME OR CIRCUMSTANCE, STOOD BEFORE HIM."

It was on Saturday afternoon that the lawyer wrote to Mrs. Wilton, and on Sunday morning he went, according to his usual custom, to the Temple church. Neither the service nor sermon impressed him very much; his thoughts were busy with the past, and instead of going for a walk, according to his almost invariable habit, he sat down in his easy chair and began to think what he would say on the morrow. Would Constance be much changed? He laughed aloud as he thought how heavily time had touched himself. When he last saw her he was a light-hearted, good-looking young fellow of twenty-five, with plentiful waving black hair that she had often run her white fingers through; now, he was old and grim and bald, and altogether unlovely. She would have altered too, doubtless, if there was any poetic justice; she should look worse than him—remorse should have silvered her hair, saddened her eyes, seared her forehead, and poverty, the iron-heeled, would have crushed her down, for Wilton was poor, and the sort of a man that would remain poor all his life, he reflected, with a grim chuckle; the sort of man who never knew how to take care of the pence, and consequently, never likely to have many pounds that might be left to their own devices—while he, Ralph Oldcastle, was rich and wallowing in wealth. The thought was soothing; it was enjoyable; money was power, influence, happiness, and money now could buy his revenge.

It was a still, sultry day, with thunder in the atmosphere. The silence in Pump Court was unbroken save by a drowsy murmer of insects in the air. As he sat alone the lawyer's thoughts went back to a Sunday long ago, when he first saw Constance Reade. The memory of that day was the happiest of his whole life—not a cloud or shadow or sad recollection darkened it; it was all clear, unbroken summer sunshine, and it was after his return, she wrote him these tender, loving letters lying in the old bureau. At Christmas he went North again accompanied by his chum, Harry Wilton. He was handsome, clever, fascinating; knew all about church decorations, acting charades, tableau vivants; could sing, dance, skate, make himself agreeable in a score of frivolous ways Ralph Oldcastle despised, but that found favor in the eyes of the ladies. Of course, he and Connie liked each other; that was only natural seeing that Harry was Ralph's chum; and after a time every one, except the two confident and happy lover, saw that Wilton was abusing his friend's kindness, and paying more than ordinary attention to Connie Reade. But the holidays ended, both young men returned to town, and a month after Wilton left suddenly, saying he had business in Scotland. Connie joined him, and they were married; leaving her astounded and indignant father to break the news to the outraged lover. The vicar was a man of honor, and though, as a Christian, he forgave his daughter, he refused to receive either her or husband; both had offended past such practical pardon as that. Ralph Oldcastle registered a vow to be revenged some day on them both, and then, with a resolution seldom equaled, he buried every thought of the woman who had deceived him and the friend who had betrayed him at the bottom of his heart, and piled monuments of thought, hard as granite, on the top of them. Wilton gave up the study of law; he could not return to London and face his friend, and some of his relatives procured him a situation in a bank in Birmingham. That was the last Ralph heard of him; he never sought to know more, but he waited with slow, unexpected persistency for the turn of fortune's wheel that he assuredly felt would bring him face to face with his enemy. And now the time was at hand. He had not gone out of his way to seek it; but Fate, who, if left to work out her will, balances most things, brought his vengeance to his very door.

Again and again he assured himself that he was happy; that had he to live his life over again he would not wish it any different. Love, marriage, little children clinging to his neck, strong sons and fair daughters to cheer and gladden him—what did they all amount to? Vanity and vexation. His daughters would leave him for the first empty whipper-snapper that came by; his sons might perhaps squander his substance in riotous living. Toil, care, worry, anxiety; would he change his life of unbroken peace and quiet for those things? No, a thousand times no. As he sat thinking a sudden shadow darkened the room, followed by a blinding flash, and then a long crackling peal of thunder, that seemed to shake the house of its very foundation. The lawyer shivered nervously and passed his hand across his brow. There was something uncanny in the air, something terribly oppressive in the awful stillness that followed that sudden peal. For the first time in his life, perhaps, he realized what it was to feel alone—utterly, really, hopelessly alone. Then through the stillness came a gentle tap at the outer door, as if the knocker was raised by a feeble or faltering hand. He listened in wonder for a few minutes; then it was repeated more loudly, and with a strange, puzzled expression he stood up and opened the door. There on the mat, pale, trembling, scared by the storm, and shrinking back as if still more afraid of him, stood Constance Reade—Connie as he had known her long ago, with the same sweet smile, tender, loving eyes and sunny hair; Connie, unaltered by time or circumstance, stood before him, mutely pleading, with outstretched hands, and with a low suppressed cry he took them and led her into the room.

"HE IS GUILTY, RALPH, BUT HE IS CONNIE'S FATHER, AND I WANT YOU TO SAVE HIM."

Ralph Oldcastle placed his trembling visitor in a seat, and regarded her curiously for a few moments, a thousand strange thoughts chasing each other through his brain. "Was Constance dead and this her ghost? Was he mad, or dreaming?" He couldn't determine, and the girl sat silent, waiting for him to speak.

"Who are you, and what can I do for you?" he said at length, in a slow, husky voice.

"I am Constance Wilton, and I've come because my mother is very ill. She bids me thank you for writing. Will you come and see her, as she is not able to come to you, and to-morrow may be too late."

"Then you are her daughter?"

"Yes; her only child. I have no one in the wide world except her, and soon, I fear, I fear ——. Oh, sir, can you do anything for her; she is dying, I think, of want and misery and loneliness, and I am powerless to help her; can you?" and she caught his hand and looked entreatingly into his face.

"I will do what I can," he replied, not meeting her glance; "what is your want?"

"Come and see mother; she says to-morrow will be too late."

"You have a father, have you not?"

"Yes, I have a father, but I have not seen him for a long time, and mother never speaks of him now," the girl replied, growing suddenly crimson and hanging her head, but Mr. Oldcastle asked no more questions. Obeying a sudden impulse, he put on his hat and said he was ready to accompany Connie home, glancing at her furtively as she led the way down stairs. "So like," he muttered, "so like that it might be her very self. Is it a mere trap, I wonder, or is she really ill?"

He was not left long in doubt; the girl walked swiftly up Fetter lane and then turned down a narrow street.

In one of the poorest and shabbiest of a row of wretched houses Mrs. Wilton and her daughter were lodging, and Ralph Oldcastle shuddered as he thought of their surroundings. But Connie passed through a double row of idlers and loungers without appearing to see them, and entered a room on the third floor. On a rickety, horse-hair sofa lay a woman with white hair, a worn, colorless face and closed eyes—Connie's mother. The lawyer started and smothered an exclamation. Could that emaciated woman be Constance Reade? Surely not!

"Mother, dear, here is Mr. Oldcastle," the girl whispered, and as she opened her eyes and extended her hand, he seemed to recognize her. A strange tremor passed through his frame as he touched those wasted fingers, and all feelings of revenge died out of his heart toward her, but, with some one else, there would be a heavy account to settle.

"Thank you for coming, Ralph," she said, faintly, "I did not ask you till the very last, but I knew you would not fail me. Connie leave us alone; I have much to say to Mr. Oldcastle."

Reluctantly the girl left the room, and closed the door after her, but she did not go far. She observed a startling change in her mother's appearance, even during the short time she had been absent. "Perhaps it may only be the effects of the storm. Mother was always dreadfully frightened by thunder," she said, as she stood at the window watching the lightning cleave through the black clouds. But her heart misgave her; there was something besides mere nervous dread in her mother's face.

Ralph Oldcastle sat down by the sofa and waited for Mrs. Wilton to speak.

"You forgive me, Ralph," she said at length, "I treated you ill, but I have suffered, and I want you to forgive him and help him; he is in prison, and will soon be tried for a terrible crime. He is guilty, Ralph, but he is Connie's father, and I want you to save him."

"If he is guilty, how can I save him?" The words came low and hoarse; the woman, for the old time's sake, was expecting too much from him.

"You are clever, Ralph, terribly clever. I have heard of you, and read all your speeches, and if you try to save any one you can; if you are against any one, there is little hope for him. Ralph, you will not appear against your old friend, against her father, and send him to a convict prison. Think of it, she will soon have no one in the world but him; would you leave her utterly friendless? So young, so beautiful, so inexperienced. If you have a daughter, Ralph, think of her now and spare my Connie."

"You ask more than it is in my power to grant, Mrs. Wilton; law and justice are not in my hands," he said, coldly.

"But you can do much; you are engaged for the prosecution in the Clifton swindling case, and—and Harry Wilton is implicated in it. If you appear against him he is lost."

"Oh!" The exclamation seemed wrenched from the very depths of Ralph Oldcastle's heart, and was followed by a long silence. "I will not appear against him," he said, at length; "don't say anything more about him now, but tell me what I can do for you."

"Nothing, Ralph. I am past all help; but if you will promise to be a friend to Connie when I am gone it will make my last hours easier. She will be utterly alone should anything—should the worst—happen to her father; but you will save him—I know you will. He was sorely tempted, and was but the tool of others. Have mercy on him, Ralph—you who never knew want or misery—who, in your happy, prosperous life, were never brought face to face with temptation. You must be merciful, for you are strong, and he has suffered."

"I will do what I can." The words slowly and reluctantly, but he could not deny the request of the woman, who with her last breath pleaded for her husband, though he had brought her to such a pitch of misery and destitution. Yet he ground his teeth with suppressed rage, as he felt his vengeance slowly slipping through his fingers. He was a hard man but he was human, and revenge was out of place by that couch; even Ralph Oldcastle felt that.

After a little more conversation about Connie, and some feebly expressed fears for her future, Mrs. Wilton suddenly sunk into a doze, and in a few moments her daughter entered the room and glanced at the couch anxiously. "Mother is worse," she whispered, "what have you been saying to her, sir?"

"Nothing, darling, only that he will be kind to you when I'm gone," the invalid said, faintly. "Mr. Oldcastle has been very, very good, Connie, and you must be grateful to him all your life."

"Yes, mother," and her eyes filled with tears. "I could not help being grateful to any one who was kind to you."

"I have done nothing, nothing—and I think your mother had better rest; she seems very much fatigued. I'll call again to-morrow," and Mr. Oldcastle left the room hurriedly, with a strange cold feeling down the back. Connie carried him dangerously into the past, and his thoughts were of her as he walked up and down the embankment for two hours before returning to his chambers. The storm had cleared away, the atmosphere was lighter and the lawyer felt lighter, too, than he had been for a long time.

Before 10 o'clock the next morning he had done two things that he would have laughed to scorn at the mere suggestion of two days before. He had thrown down his brief in the great Clifton swindling case, and secured the services of an able counsel to defend Henry Wilton. Then he went round to Mrs. Wilton's lodgings, feeling a stealthy sensation of pleasure as he anticipated her joy and gratitude. Connie opened the door in answer to his knock, laid her finger on her lip to command silence as she led him in. The blind was down, and the room in deep shadow. "Mother's asleep; she has slept quite peacefully for some hours," the girl whispered, moving on tip-toe, "we must be very careful not to wake her." Cautiously Ralph Oldcastle drew near the sofa, and laid one finger on the wasted wrist. Then he drew back suddenly, and Connie was at his side in a moment. One look into his face and she read the whole truth. There was no more waking in this world for Constance Wilton, and with an exceedingly bitter cry her daughter dropped down insensible at Ralph Oldcastle's feet.

"I MIGHT HAVE KNOWN WHAT TO EXPECT FROM A WOMAN'S GRATITUDE."

Six months passed by before the grim lawyer in Pump Court fully realized the great change that had come over him. Life was no longer the dull monotonous routine it had been. There was brightness and beauty in the solidly shabby chambers, for Constance Wilton was there. She had been living with Mr. Oldcastle ever since her mother's death. He took her home that day, and she had never left him since. His efforts were unavailing to save her father; he was too clearly guilty, but death released him from paying the penalty of his crimes; and save for her self-constituted guardian, Connie was alone in the world. At first the lawyer did not know what to do with her, but she adapted herself to his life, and fitted with his ways wonderfully. There was plenty of room in those rambling chambers, and she soon had two little closets fitted up for herself, where she couple retire to if she seemed at all in the way. As the weeks and months passed he became distinctly conscious of one thing—he could never lose her again. She had grown into his heart and into his life, filling the place once occupied by her mother, and this second love that had sprung up in him was perhaps more intense than the first. One day he did not go out in the morning according to his usual custom, and Connie started when she entered the sitting-room and found him there.

She blushed to a deep crimson and seemed uneasy, and Mr. Oldcastle construed the circumstances favorably, and resolved to hesitate no longer. "Come here, Constance," he said, gently drawing her to the high couch, "I have something of great importance to say to you. Listen, my dear one, I love you. I want you to be my wife!"

"Oh, no, no—that can never be," she cried, springing away from him with such an expression of utter dismay that he grew sick and chill. "Oh, please, Mr. Oldcastle, don't say that!"

"I must say it, for it is true. I love you," he replied, with some return of his dogged manner; "whether you care for me or not is another question. Am I so very hateful that you cannot even come near me?"

"It is not that," she wailed, kneeling beside him and hiding her face on his knee. "I love you dearly, dearly, but not that way—I never thought of it, never dreamed of it."

"Is it too late to think of it now, then?"

"Yes, too late. Oh, please do not say any more."

"You love some one else. As your guardian, I have at least the right to ask that. Tell me the truth, Constance, I will know it," he added, fiercely—jealousy, anger and disappointment all surging like fire through his veins, but she only sobbed silently, uttering no word, and glancing at him with pleading, tearful eyes.

"I might have known what the expect from a woman's gratitude," he muttered, fiercely, "like mother—like daughter, only she has not deceived me. She, at least, has not deluded me with false promises and false hopes, but she is not honest and straight. How could she be with such a father and mother?"

At that moment the sitting-room door opened suddenly, and Edward Little swung into the room. Seeing Connie sobbing on the carpet, he was at her side in a moment.

"My darling, what is the matter?" he said, taking both her hands, "are you ill?"

Ralph Oldcastle reeled back a step as if struck with a sudden blow. "You, too," he cried; "this is too much. Edward Little, stand back; and Constance Wilton, look up and answer me."

"I'll answer for her, sir," the young fellow said firmly, drawing the trembling girl closer to him. "I love her, and she returns my affection and has promised to be my wife, that's all. I'm sorry, sir, that we did not ask your consent, but it came on us both before we knew."

"You have spoken to me of gratitude, Edward Little; it pleased you on various occasions to remark that I had been a friend to you. Did you mean to prove your gratitude by stealing the affections of my ward, and betraying the confidence I reposed in you—but I expected nothing, and am not disappointed. You may go. I have nothing further to say!"

"But I have, sir! I have betrayed no trust, been guilty of no fault. Day after day, week after week, month after month, you have left her here alone, without a soul to speak to save me. I loved her—under the circumstances no one could help doing so—and was fortunate enough to win her affections in return; surely there is no great crime in that. But I am ready to go!"

"Then do go," the lawyer thundered, "and never let me look on your face again. As for you, Constance, you must choose between him and me; give him up and you shall be as my own child; cleave to him and we are strangers. Choose!"

"Is there no other way?" she cried, clasping her hands. "Oh! sir, be merciful to us!"

"Choose!" he repeated, sternly.

Slowly she withdrew her hand and placed it in Edward Little's. "I have chosen, sir. I thank you for all your great kindness. I am deeply, bitterly grieved at having offended you, but I love Edward. I cannot give him up."

"So much for a woman's gratitude," the lawyer said, scornfully. "Still you are honest, and I respect the quality when I meet with it. You may remain here for a week; by that time I suppose Mr. Little will have a home of some sort to take you to. And now I think this interview may end."

* * * * * * * * *

Ralph Oldcastle appeared at the breakfast table next morning with a very pale face and a curious, scared expression in his eyes; Connie was at her accustomed post, but she looked ill and haggard after a sleepless night. To her infinite surprise her guardian bent down and kissed her tenderly on the forehead. "I was harsh yesterday, my dear; forget all I said to you and tell Edward I forgive him, and that he may come back."

He was not a man who did anything by halves, and when Connie and Edward were married they had a pleasant home provided for them and a liberal income. It was a long time before they learned the reason of his sudden forgiveness, and then they thought it a slight cause for such a very happy effect. Mr. Oldcastle had dreamed that Mrs. Wilton stood by his bedside and asked him, for Auld Lang Syne, to be kind to her child; then finding he did not answer, she added, solemnly, "Forgive, as you hope to be forgiven." Three times was the dream repeated before he gave in. He never told them of the icy touch on his forehead, of the bodily presence he believed stood by his bedside, but his pride was broken, his heart softened, and he pardoned Connie Wilton and her lover.

And he never regretted it. They are his children now, and their little ones will cheer and comfort his old age. Revenge to some natures may be sweet, but stern Ralph Oldcastle has found out that it's infinitely sweeter to forgive.

A LONDON LOVE.

The day of parting has come, dear,
The day we've delayed so long;
But the strings of my lute are dumb, dear,
And have lost their trick of song.

I have known them the hour together
Run on to the lightest theme—
The fashions, the parks, or the weather,
A fancy, a flower, a dream.

When the mirth of life was maddest,
To my hand they would leap and bound;
And when darkest my mood and saddest,
Would whisper their softest sound.

Whenever the day was breezy,
Whenever the mad moon shone,
Rhyme-spinning was just as easy
As loving and passing on.

Of the garden of sweet girl-dancers
If one pleased me more than the rest,
And our hands, as they met in the Lancers,
For a moment clung and press'd,

Ere the world was another day older,
I would sing her a song of love
Inscribed to her round, white shoulder,
Or the little pink ear above.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

The Ideal Housewife.

The best rifle in the world has a limit to its range. The best housewife in the world has a bounded horizon of cuisine, says the Whitehall Review. So much for the defect; now for the remedy. It is sufficiently simple. It is but to add at least one dish to the family possibilities every week, and strictly to carry out the resolution. This must be a plat of utter newness, some secret lately learned by a Buckmaster or a Francatelli. Were every chatelaine to carry out such a resolution, what a rich result of added charm would accrue to our national cookery! What worlds to conquer lie around us, undiscovered, unexplored! The immediate results may be slightly uncertain, as was the plunging of the flesh-forks of the priests of old into the flesh-pots; but we may feel assured that in both cases practice breeds dexterity, and, while the more inexperienced of the priests' servants may occasionally have fetched up a very insufficient meal, no such accident was likely to occur to the adroit experimentalist whom former disappointment had rendered cautious. Invite some insignificant person to lunch, some poor relative, say, and take his opinion. Only be careful to rob his appetite of its outer edge before setting before him the dish on whose merits you wish him to be critically judicial. Hunger is such excellent sauce that it inclines a man to approve occasionally of quite a faulty dish. Not many women possess that cultivated refinement of the palate which detects in a moment the smallest error in the manufacture of a plat. This is partly a gift of nature, partly the result of cultivation. The undue preponderance of one ingredient over another is discovered immediately, and, if the necessary revision can be suggested before the dish appears at the dinner table, it is well. Men have hitherto carried away all the honors of the cordon bleu. They seem to be gifted with an extra gustatory sense. This may result from the fact that they seldom neglect their opportunities, as women do. Who ever heard of a man preferring high tea to dinner? Many women do. Breathes there a man who can find a word in defense of dining early on Sundays? The majority of women not only countenance, but foster and cherish the practice. This disregard of opportunities for cultivating the subtler sensations of the palate is, in view of a life partnership, at least unwise. Every possible bond of sympathy should be studied, and the education of the sense of taste may be productive of effects more important than might be generally supposed. To regard with scorn so humble a factor in the grand total of domestic bliss is no proof of superiority, but rather of the indolence which folds calm hands and lets things slide. The wife who can sympathize with a man's literary or political aspirations, and yet does not disdain to heartily echo his approval of some refined form of serving his food, may be described, in the words of the genial Autocrat of the Breakfast-table, as a harp of a thousand strings.

Beauty by Contrasts.

By a peculiarity in costuming, Worth has created beauty where none was realized to exist before his genius developed latent loveliness. So the story goes. Neither social position, wealth nor intellect can give physical beauty, and in many cases the daughters of rich parents are not noted for their attractions, save in dollars and cents, and the New York millionaire's only child was no exception to this rule. She was well educated, rather bright, but exceedingly shy, and so impressed with her sense of inferiority in appearance that she seemed stupid. Her eyes were large and full, but of no particular color, and her complexion was horrid; neither black nor colors became her. She, however, had a good, but undeveloped form, and her wealth of hair was magnificent. Her parents realized that style alone could save her from absolute ugliness, and that she failed to assume after unprecedented efforts of New York's most popular modistes. Therefore she was taken to Paris, and placed in Worth's hands with with carte blanche for her becoming apparel. Worth never had so unsatisfactory a subject. In vain he tried color after color, shade after shade, tint after tint. There she stood, indifferent in her discouragement. Black increased the pallor of her white skin and colors brought out no attractive tints. A huge pile of pure white tulle was lying near, and Worth, angry and impatient, grasped the folds, with the exclamation: 'There is nothing else to try but this," and he literally enveloped the girl's form in coil after coil of the silken gauze. The poor child, standing before the glass, sought to hide the hateful reflection from herself, and covered her face with her hands, but they were rudely withdrawn by the astonished artist, who saw upon neck and hands a clear, pure tint. "Mademoiselle, look!" he exclaimed. The girl grasped the inspiration, and like a flash she withdrew the pins that secured the waving masses of her glorious hair, and seizing some ornaments of frosted silver lying on a table near, she placed them like a coronet above her forehead. Her eyes grew brilliant with the light of newly awakened pride, and over her checks passed a pink flush that had never before rested there. Worth was exalted and triumphant. He had, indeed, wrought a miracle, and for weeks his assistants were employed in executing toilets in pure white, after his most artistic designs.

Fashionable Ladies Hammering Brass.

A number of ladies who were studying the latest fashionable handicraft of brass-beating at one of the private schools in Philadelphia have made a new and practical departure by giving up the theories of books and book-learned teachers and placing themselves as apprentices under a regular brass-beater in an establishment where it is carried on as a business. They had been getting their hammers and tracing tools for a long time from a practical workman, who has been tracing and modeling brass for over forty years. In visiting the place, getting tools and brass and block, some of the ladies were struck with the thorough and practical way things were done and very soon found out that the school was, a great deal of it, child's play, and that if they wanted to make beautiful and lasting work they would have to take up the methods of the factory. Accordingly, for nearly a year the herculean and sardonic brass-beater has had under his care a class comprising some of the best known ladies of Philadelphia, and has so instructed them in the way of using and holding their tools, and in the proper kind of stroke to make upon the steel dies, that some of them, who have had a good deal of practice, are enabled to make articles in repousse brass of which they are justly proud. The method is very simple and primitive. A sheet or plate of brass is fastened on a block of wood. The design is drawn upon it and the outline is hammered by a die, which has several dots in a row. Then there is a die that makes the groundwork have a frosted, mottled appearance, and other dies that make a variety of impressions. Everything depends upon the skill of the hands that hold the tools. Out of a piece of brass costing a few dollars there can be made something that could not be purchased for less than $25 or $50. Card receivers are among the things most made, and all sorts of curious things are made for wedding presents, the articles deriving a special value from being made by the giver's hand. The work develops the muscles, and is one of the best means of educating the hands in the mechanical arts. Ladies have become so fond of the work that they lay in supplies of brass and amuse themselves with it while away at the seaside and other resorts. It is possible for any girl, with a little patience, to earn in this way two or three times as much as she would earn standing in a store.

The Summer Medicine Chest.

No one leaving home to spend the summer in the country should go without a few simple remedies; they may be the means of preventing a great deal of suffering, if not loss of life. A doctor is not always to be had the moment he is wanted, and, if he were, there are a great many cases which the mother could treat as well as he if she had the proper medicines. "A stitch in time saves nine" in mending the body as well as its habiliments, and the time consumed in getting what is necessary from a distant apothecary's shop may make the rent so large that it is beyond repair.

A stout wooden box should be got, about ten inches long, six wide and six high, and divided into compartments large enough to hold a two-ounce bottle, leaving a space at one end for bandages, old linen, cotton, wool, etc. An extra supply of these may be taken, but some should always be kept in the medicine chest, and they may be forthcoming at a moment's notice. The box should be fastened with a button or hook, not with a lock and key, as the latter would certainly be missing in an emergency. It can be kept in a closet or on a high shelf, out of the reach of children, and no one else is likely to meddle with it.

It will hold twelve bottles, and these should be filled with castor oil, paregoric, chalk mixture, peppermint, extract of ginger, ipecac, Wyeth's soda mint pills and compressed Dover pills (five grains), extract of witch hazel, carbolic acid, glycerine and bicarbonate of soda. To these should be added a tin box of cosmoline, a roll of Seabury & Johnson's salicylated plaster, a bottle of flexible collodion, a tin case of prepared mustard plasters, and two short glass tubes, one bent, the other straight.

With this equipment, any woman of ordinary common sense can carry her children through the summer without having recourse to a doctor. An india-rubber hot-water bag, holding three pints or two quarts, will be found a great comfort, as it is not always easy to get a bottle, or, if that is procured, to find a cork to fit it. They cost about $2 each. If this is thought too great an expense, it is a good plan to take as a substitute three or four empty lager-beer bottles. The metal fastenings, being attached to the bottles, are always in place when wanted. They can be filled with very hot water without breaking them, if, during the process, they are wrapped in cloths wrung out of cold water.

What Women Can Do.

"Women," said a successful woman jeweler, "can do anything and everything nowadays. When I first had to earn my living I thought myself fortunate when I secured a place behind a milliner's counter. Well, I sold bonnets for a year, and the store was closed. Then I painted furniture, if you will believe it. It wasn't hard to learn, and I earned $12 a week instead of $7. But I soon quit that for better employment, and was hired in a jewelry establishment. There I learned the trade, and I am as independent as you are." Miss Dora Kinney of Wild Cat, Ind., is a successful, money-making shepherdess. A few years ago an uncle gave her an orphaned lamb to raise by hand, which she did successfully, and becoming so much interested in sheep husbandry, she procured a mate for the lamb, and she now sports a fold of twenty-eight old sheep and thirty-three lambs—sixty-one in all, all from the first starting pair. Miss Kinney attends to her flocks altogether herself, both winter and summer, and now receives quite a handsome little income from the annual sales of wool and mutton. New occupations for women are yearly springing into being. The latest things I've heard of are landscape gardeners, bird fanciers, architects, junk dealers and pawnbrokers. Women do all these things now. Indeed, I'm afraid a bad time is coming. Women do so many kinds of work that the men will all become dudes. The fine, idle creatures these days certainly are not women.

Keeping Cool.

The Decorator and Furnisher for the current month has some good suggestions on the subject of keeping cool, and quotes the old saying that what keeps out cold keeps out heat, and as our houses are mainly constructed with a view of protecting us from that sort of weather of which we have the most, namely: cold, there is no reason why, with care, we should not make our thick walls and solid fittings equally available to protect us from a sirocco as well as a northeaster. This, however, can only be done by proceeding upon the same principle with both—by shutting it out. Therefore, before the rays of the midsummer sun become at all vertical we should carefully exclude the outer air, draw down the blinds, close the shutters particularly, if the windows are not protected by outside blinds. The latter are quite indispensable for the perfect accomplishment of our object, for it is a great point to prevent the glass getting hot; indeed, when the glass has once become heated it is almost impossible to bring down the temperature of a room as low as would have been the case had the windows been protected by canvass, or jalousie, early in the morning. Of course, these precautions must be taken with the side of the house which faces south or west; the other aspects require comparatively little consideration, except the rooms at the top, where the effect of the sun on the roof will always make itself disagreeably felt, and the top story is therefore always the most difficult to keep cool.

Veiling.

A very pretty toilet lately worn at a lawn party was of primrose-colored nuns' veiling. The skirt was finished with three shell-pleated flounces caught up at intervals with bows of satin ribbon. Across the front was draped an apron overskirt of Turkish embroidery. This embroidery was executed upon a soft, pliable, but very rich satin of a tint exactly matching that of the veiling. The drapery terminated in the back in a wide sash and ends, the loopings being very bouffant. The harmonious effect of the soft red and gold, which was the dominant colors of the embroidery, were intensified by the deep red lining of the hat made of ficelle lace. This hat was very large and was one of the few worn. Snug and jaunty Langtry turbans, French toques, flowers and lace and other dainty little head covering were almost universal, except on very young ladies. A few of the panache bonnets, high in the crown, and almost hidden under floating feathers, made their appearance, but not one of them looked well. A woman should be at least six feet high to wear one of these head-gears without being absolutely dwarfed by it. The prettiest and most becoming head coverings which were worn were those, without exception, which gave no signs of an attempt to "astonish the native or scare the fish."

Sateens.

Notwithstanding the array of fashionable gay stripes, plaids, summer zephyrs in harlequin designs, and regular tennis fabrics in gorgeous patterns and colorings, there is really nothing outside of the expensive costumes that make prettier tennis dresses than the Pompadour sateens. The colors of these are, as a rule, very delicate and beautiful. This has been raised as an objection to them, that viewed at a distance on a tennis ground they lose their effect. To rectify this and alter the neutrality of a wholly light-colored costume, a deep directoire collar and a pocket pouch of some vivid color may be worn. A fair girl may wear a costume of doe-colored sateen brocaded with corn flowers and the collar, pouch, or apron may be of peacock-blue plush or silk. And a brunette may impart a gypsy-like and picturesque coloring to her appearance by wearing over a costume of maize-colored sateen a large kerchief of scarlet silk knotted loosely at the throat, a maize-colored silk apron, hand-painted or embroidered with scarlet hedge roses, and with this a pair of Charles IX. low-cut shoes, over red silk stockings clocked with gold color.

Miss Middie Morgan.

Miss Middie Morgan, the much-written-about live stock reporter of the Times and Herald, has bought a lot of property on Staten island and is going to build a cottage there. The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Record writes: The cellar is already dug and the foundation stones are laid, but the work has got no further along for many months. Miss Morgan is a specialist, so she is well paid for her work. If she should strike she would, no doubt, get what she demanded at once, for it would be hard to find even a man to take her place. I have not the pleasure of Miss Morgan's acquaintance, but I have seen her hundreds of times and heard her talk. She has a rich Irish brogue, and talks very well. She is quite a lady, and tramping about the stock yards of Communipaw has not robbed her of any refinement. So far as appearance goes she looks rough—not so much her face as her dress and figure; but she is as gentle, I am told by those who know her, as the most delicately nurtured belle, and I have no doubt a great deal more tender hearted; but you would not think so to see her lunging along in her short skirts and big shoes, utterly oblivious to the gaping crowd.

Worth.

Worth is employing for some of his handsomest toilets brocades with flowers gigantic enough to vex, by the size of the figures, even his consummate art at arranging materials to make them reasonably quiet and unobtrusive. This he manages chiefly by using only a small quantity of this gorgeous material in each dress, and never using it for the corsage. One of his latest creations is a golden olive satin, with a ground of dark olive brocade, the figure being a huge magnolia with foliage in shades of golden olive and pale greens. The train is of the plain golden satin and the skirt is of the brocade. The front is caught up slightly to show a narrow knife-pleated ruffle of dark olive satin, over which falls a fringe composed of little silk floss balls in the varied tones of the brocade.

Coats.

Waistcoats of almost every shape and material are exceedingly fashionable, but this style of bodice demands the most careful fit and finish, otherwise their introduction will often mar good effect of an otherwise stylish toilet. the Amateur dressmakers and ladies who cannot command the services of the best modistes would do better to limit their desires to those added trimmings, which, though less aspiring, are quite as fashionable and much more easily arranged. For example, suppose a perfectly plain, close-fitting corsage. On this may be placed a plastron of satin or lace, either long or short, wide or narrow, as is best suited to the figure of the wearer. Shirred silk fichus edged with lace are also easily adjusted, and a number of these in white and pale evening shades make a pretty variety for brightening a single dress of black silk or satin.

Black.

Black toilets, especially in airy fabrics, over either a black or bright-colored foundation, are now in the height of fashion. Such dresses are of black chantilly, Spanish lace, brocaded grenadine, or silk gauze, trimmed with pleated flounces alternating with those of lace. Some of the imported dresses of black, lace and and other diaphanous fabrics are trimmed with exquisite silver passementeries and ornaments forming pendants at the ends of narrow satin ribbons upon the tablier and scarfs, and at the edges of the crenelated bodice. Silver lace is also used, and the draperies are held with silver buckles in filigree in old Roman designs.

Steaks.

There is no part of the animal like the round boned sirloin, says Miss Parloa. "Rump cuts contain three grades of meat, and ought to be separated parallel with the backbone. The best roast in the animal is on the back of the rump. The top sirloin is the toughest part of the steak, but as it contains no bone it is economical. Round steak should never be cut less than an inch thick. The lower end of round steak is very nice for a stew, or for any slow method of cooking. Steaks from the top of the round must be cooked quickly, so as to harden the albumen on the outside. They should be rare. The first cut of rib roast is particularly economical for small families. Meat ought to hang three weeks."

Around the House.

If the noble army of dyspeptic martyrs would be entirely reconstructed, they must adopt the chopped beefsteaks for diet. They are made of beef from the most tender and juicy part of the round, but in a machine called the American chopper, in such a way as to separate the nutritious part from the tough, cellular or fibrous structure that contains it and which forms more than one-third of the substance. This pulp is carefully removed with a spoon and lightly formed into a cake of the thickness of ordinary beefsteak, broiled and seasoned with salt, pepper, or other condiments. This is perfectly digestible and far more delicious than a filet steak. Two glasses of hot water taken an hour and a half before eating, and a diet of this beef, will give the most incorrigible dyspeptic new views of life.

A great return for a small investment is realized by purchasing a small soldering outfit for a boy. He becomes at once a useful member of the family; old basins and pans become as new after the transforming touch of his soldering iron, and there are great possibilities in tin cans, and small pieces of tin; sugar sifters and funnels, are among them. I am convinced that lack of interesting occupation is the prolific source of most bad habits that an idle boy acquires; that parents feel this, and many are likely to fall into the error of providing too many finished playthings for them. It seems that the aim should be to give them tools with which they may exercise the imagination, and with which they may construct articles that do not yet exist.

A pretty fancy for decorating picture frames is to paint the plain molding blue, or pink, or any color you choose, and then decorate it with flowers. Small frames for the pictures of authors, and intended for the library, may be made suggestive by decorating them with the author's favorite flower. For instance, the frame of Bryant's picture might be painted a light blue, which would be a suitable background for "the yellow violet's modest bell," or a dull yellow would serve as background for the gentian, "colored with the heavens' own blue."

Since fans still continue to be popular as wall decorations, they can be made at home at small expense. For foundation get the cheap figured paper fans, paint or gild the handles, and cover the fan with silk, satin, or any other handsome material: These may be decorated with ribbon or Kensington embroidery.

A decorative article that may be made in various ways is shaped like the genuine George Washington hatchet; it should be of seasoned white wood, and may be covered with plush, velvet or satin; it may be painted or embroidered upon, or it may serve as a frame for a hollywood panel.

An elegant panel for a screen is of black velvet, with peacocks' feathers embroidered on it. If tired of flowers and the ordinary applique work, this will be a particularly pleasing design, and it is handsome if done on felt for the ends of a table scarf.

A pretty lounge quilt is made of blue silesia. Tuft it with white Saxony yarn, with a thread of yellow worsted in the center. The design of the tuft is a small water lily, though it must be confessed that it doesn't look much like it.

For the Teeth.

A nice meringue pudding is delicious. Take four tablespoonfuls of rice, wash it, and put it in one quart of milk; let it boil slowly till perfectly soft, then take it from the fire and sweeten it to your taste. Stir in with the sugar a lump of butter the size of an egg. When it has cooled sufficiently—that is, so that it will not scald the eggs—stir in the yolks of four eggs and grate the rind of a lemon; this need not be a large one, but it ought to be fresh. If the pudding seems too thick, add a little cold milk. Smooth it over the top, and spread over it the whites of the four eggs beaten stiff with the juice of the lemon, and eight tablespoonfuls of sugar beaten with them. Bake until a light brown. If you have no lemon, or do not care to use one, spread on the top of the rice, before putting the white of the egg over it, a layer of jam or jelly, or of fresh fruit.

An excellent meat sauce, for use at any season of the year, calls for four quarts of ripe tomatoes, one cup and a half of red pepper cut in bits, one cup of chopped onions, one cup and a half of sugar, half a cup of salt, one pint and a half of vinegar, one teaspoonful and a half of cloves, the same quantity of cinnamon, one teaspoonful each of ginger and nutmeg. Let this boil for three hours, then bottle and seal, or put in pint cans. If the tomatoes, onions, and pepper are chopped very fine, it is best not to strain the sauce.

"Do you wish to know," said a man of science, walking into my kitchen yesterday, "how to know that your fruit can is certainly air-tight?" I was at that moment contemplating a can which had a little nick on the upper edge, and it was hard to judge whether the rubber would effectually keep the air out. The man lighted a bit of paper, put it into the can, slipped the rubber ring over, and put the glass cover on. The burning paper exhausted the air, and behold the cover was with difficulty removed.

An old-time rule for doughnuts is called for by a correspondent who thinks that things used to taste better than they do now. The recipe is given, but along with it I cannot give the appetite of his boyhood: In one pint of sweet milk dissolve two teaspoonfuls of bi-carbonate of soda; to this add two eggs, two cups of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of butter, two quarts of flour, with four teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar mixed with the flour while both are dry. Knead and roll with quick, light touches, and fry in hot lard.

Fruit cake for a wedding or large party can be made some weeks, and even months, before using, and it will improve with age if it is well taken care of. Last year the fruit cake for a December wedding was made in September, and was especially and noticeably nice. Three times—that would be about once a month—brandy was poured over it; a small quantity of course, and it was allowed to absorb it.

Corn fritters, or oysters, as some humbug-loving cooks call them, are now in season. To six ears of grated corn add one well-beaten egg, a little salt and a tablespoonful of sweet milk, with enough flour to make a stiff batter. Drop in hot lard and fry a delicate brown.

"Just Too Lovely."

Mrs. John Bigelow has met with a brilliant success. At Newport, the other day, she had a call from Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. Mrs. Bigelow has a decided penchant for literary celebrities, and, taking Mrs. Howe out upon her piazza, she asked her to say something about it which would be quoted and become immortal. Mrs. Howe looked at her host for a moment, and then throwing her eyes out over the scene, replied: "Really, madam, I don't know what to say, except that it's a bully piazza, anyway." Score one for Mrs. John this time.

Jay Gould was circumvented by a female book agent. She called day after day until finally the messenger informed Mr. Gould, who ordered that she be admitted into his presence. "I suppose, Mr. Gould," said she, "when you know my business you will kill me. I am selling books." But after some persuasion he purchased a volume, and gave her a list of names of his friends to whom he thought she could sell. Russell Sage was the only one with whom she was not successful.

Crepe de Chine dresses form elegant toilets, much in favor at the summer resorts. Copper color, dark blue, red and black dresses for day wear made of this crape are trimmed with embroidery and many yards of black lace. White, crevette pink, salmon, turquoise and lilac crape dresses for the evening are trimmed with billowy puffs and cascades of white lace.

The long, ample overskirt which appears on some of the latest French dresses is becoming to figures both slender and stout, and is an agreeable change from the short, bunchy tunics and paniers now so fashionable. This style of overdress is suitable for the most costly evening dresses, as well as for costumes for traveling and the promenade.

Belts of red, blue, or white canvas are worn with flannel dresses in the country. For tan-colored belts, alligator skin is used, and black belts are made of the small-grained sealskin. Russia leather of dark russet color makes a handsome belt for black dresses. The belts vary in width from an inch and a half to three inches.

Stamped velvet is now used for the large sunshades so much in vogue. In cream-white trimmed with deep chenille fringes, soft silk tape fringe, or with a wide gathered ruffle of lace and lined with pale-tinted surahs in mauve, gold or pink, they are very rich and showy in appearance, and find a ready sale.

Vermilion-red satin parasols are in great favor with country toilets. They have an edging of buff embroidery under the pinked edge of the parasol, and the long oaken stick is curved at the top like a shepherdess's crook, and finished at the handle with a metal tip that makes it useful as a walking stick.

Low shoes are universally worn this summer in the country and at the most fashionable hotels. Patent leather ties are considered in the best style, and these may have tan-colored or blue kid tops with only tips of the glossy leather. Low heels are in better taste than the curved high French heels, and of course are much more comfortable.

The latest devices for ornamenting pocket books, fans, pouches, and all such dainty knick-knacks, is a cluster of strawberries stamped in relief upon cream-white velvet or undressed kid, and then either hand-painted or covered with silk chenille work. The effect is very charming.

The thatched bonnet is a summer novelty. It is made of gray porcupine straw with round high crown and clinging sides that are covered with bunches of grapes, berries and plumes, and edged with rows of pointed lace.

New evening dresses from Paris have the bodice and train of damask silk, and the front of puffed tulle draped with bunches of gay flowers that have long stems tied with knots and ends of ribbon.

Five hundred yards of narrow ribbon which is scarcely more than braid in width are used on a single dress in rosettes, bows and loops that form a fringe, of which the whole vest and tablier are made.

Leghorn straw flats trimmed with crepe lisse lace, and bunches of fruit veiled with lace, are the dressy hats at gay watering places.

Gold lace and crimson roses trim the Langtry turban.

A POET'S CASTLE.

Graceful Little Ceremonies at the Laying of the Corner Stone in E. C. Stedman's Summer Home.

The corner stone of the new cottage of the poet Edmund Clarence Stedman was laid at New Castle, N. H., with pleasant but informal ceremonies last week. His lot is situated on Jaffrey Point and is approached from the main road through a lane bordered with old gray stone walls, covered here and there with wild roses, just now in full bloom. A more fitting spot than New Castle for a poet to build his home in could scarcely be found. Although for the past 100 years, until the erection of "The Wentworth," this picturesque island has been given over to solitude, except for the little fishing village perched on one side, it is as historic as beautiful. Directly opposite, six miles away, is Mrs. Thaxter, the songstress of the Isles of Shoals. The records of early days show a long procession of distinguished men touching at these shores—discoverers, warriors, statesmen, kings and presidents. First among them are the names of Capt. John Smith, whose monument may be seen on Star island, and Samuel Champlain; later, Washington and Lafayette, Talleyrand and Louis Philippe. Mr. Stedman's house, which is to be an artistic one, is designed by the young architect, Mr. E. M. Wheelright, of Boston, who has just completed the mansion, situated near by, of Mr. Jacob Wendell, of New York. A conspicuous feature of it will be a tower looking seaward, built of the native gray stone of the island. It stands on a rocky point, the foundations of the tower rising from a ledge of which it seems to be a part. It will be a composite structure, largely made up of resemblances, in its stone work, to the Norman style, and in its wood work to that of Queen Anne, though the whole design is an original creation on the part of the architect. At 12:30 on Monday the corner stone was gracefully laid by Mrs. Stedman, who formed the center of a little group, composed of her husband, the architect, the master mason, a few friends and the workmen, after which a goblet of red wine was poured over it amid three rousing cheers. In a leaden box placed under the stone were copies of Mr. Stedman's works, with the poems of his mother, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Kinney, and those of Mrs. Thaxter and Mr. Albee, photographs of the family, some coins, newspapers of date, Mr. Wheelright's drawings of the house and various documents. After some punch had been enjoyed by the guests and workmen, a poetical interlude, written for the occasion by Mr. Albee, was charmingly spoken by Mr. Albee's two daughters, Esther and Louile, assisted by Miss Edith Cones and Master "Jack" Wendell. It was as follows:

LOUIE.

Whose walls are these, whose rising tower
By our old "Fairy Field" I find?
Who thus defies the Ocean's power
Where earth her realm has half resigned?

ESTHER.

A poet! None but poet dare
With what he loves to boldly pledge;
And here, long years may ruin spare
The stone he joins to kindred ledge.

EDITH.

Yes; soon in all he dreams of home
For love, for friends, for toil or ease,
May Muse and yonder fairies come
With gifts and songs his years to please.

JACK (to Mrs. Stedman).

And give to her whose careful aid
Will deck these walls with beauty's art,
The Grace's touch and Laurel shade,
And blend with all her woman's heart.

CHORUS (by all).

O'er all the architect has planned,
And all the dexterous masons wrought,
We hold a trusting, helping hand,
And join with theirs our friendly thought.

Dear friends and neighbors soon to be,
Accept our hearts and hands to-day;
And here, beside the listening sea,
Your corner-stone we joyful lay.

After some impromptu toasts and responses had been given, the little company of friends and neighbors strolled home over the beach and through the lane redolent with wild roses and new-mown hay. Immediately upon the conclusion of the little ceremonies, Mr. Stedman went to Portsmouth to take the train for New York. He will return again in August, Mrs. Stedman meantime occupying the pretty cottage of Prof. Bartlett, which stands on a hill near by, from which she can overlook during the summer the rising walls of her new home. During the laying of the stone a large black eagle sailed across the sky, and for a short time in the afternoon of that day, away to the south, a rare and beautiful mirage was seen over and about the Isles of Shoals.

GENERAL NEWS GOSSIP.

The failure of George William Ballou & Co., was followed by the suspension of the firm of E. C. Stedman & Co., bankers and brokers, 30 Broad street. At 1 p. m. Edmund C. Stedman announced from the rostrum of the stock exchange that pending the examination into the affairs of Cecil, Ward & Co., he had made an assignment. The firm is composed of E. C. Stedman and his son Frederick, who has been a member for three years past. The following statement was made to a reporter by Stedman's brother-in-law: Stedman returned to his office Monday from a three days' vacation, and upon looking into the accounts of the firm found a large deficiency. He at once caused a thorough investigation, and was almost prostrated by discovering that during his absence Frederick Stedman had been speculating heavily on his own account with moneys belonging to the firm. Although not positively known, it is supposed that his transactions were made through the firm of Cecil, Ward & Co. The liabilities will not exceed $200,000 and the suspension will be only temporarily.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

The first legal execution which ever occurred in western Montana, took place recently at Missoula, in the hanging of Ah Yung, a Chinaman, in the Missoula jail yard. It was witnessed by about 100 people. The crime for which this execution was the penalty, was committed Jan. 29, last, when in an attempt to blow up the tent of the China paymaster at Horse Plains, and rob the inmates, Ah Yung shot and killed the Chinaman who owned the tent, and wounded his brother, who attempted to follow him. To the last Ah Yung maintained his innocence. Tickets of admission as a guard were issued by the sheriff to those who were present. When brought to the scaffold the condemned man sat for about ten minutes in a common chair while prayer was offered by Rev. G. M. Fisher, of the Presbyterian church. The Chinamen stepped boldly up to be bound, the noose was quietly adjusted, and in less than a minute he was dropped off into eternity.

Watkins, a prominent cattle raiser near Canyon City, was lynched by a lot of cowboys, Watkins had fenced in a large tract of land, which had prevented the cowboys from roaming at will over the territory, a perogative which they claim. He refused them and they fired, one shot going through his lungs. The men then ran away and escaped. Burt was taken to his home, and was attended by Drs. Moore and Bendike, who probed for the ball, but failed to find it. They, however, believe that the revolver used was 46-caliber. Burt described the three men, saying two were short and one tall. End of the Telegraph Strike.

Master Workman Campbell on the 17th inst. issued a general order releasing the brotherhood of telegraph operators from remaining longer out of work. The immediate reason for his action was the pressure from members of the brotherhood on the executive committee to bring the strike to an end, but the public will take it as an admitted fact that the failure of the strikers to keep all their men out, the lapse of public interest and sympathy in the cause of the strikers, and the ability of the telegraph company to perform more of its business than was expected it could with scabs and plugs, were the real causes of the breakdown. A large number, probably two-thirds of the strikers, were set at work on their own application, after taking an obligation not to have anything more to do with the brotherhood organization. The Western Union now has men enough in all probability, and is able to mobilize its forces so as to protect itself amply.

A Healthy Corporation.

Pittsburg Special to Philadelphia Press: The Standard Oil company acknowledges duty of obedience to no government, state or national home or foreign, and in none of the big books annually issued are to be found statements as to its capital, earnings, dividends, etc. It began with a capital of $1,000,000, then jumped to $3,000,000, and later gave out that its capital had been increased to $70,000,000. It is safe to say, however, that this great growth of money power was not drawn from the pockets of the stockholders, but was simply a turning about of its earnings.

In order that the "insiders" might retain control of affairs, the greater portion of the new stock thus created was put in the shape of a trust, and conferred upon the purchasers no voice or vote in the management of the corporation. The net profits of the Standard from the formation to Dec. 31, 1882, were as follows:

1871-7	$28,012,590	1881	12,603,525
1878	8,629,161	1882	12,359,507

Effort to Exculpate Carey.

London Special: The confidential letters written by the murdered informer Carey to his solicitors while he was confined in jail have been published. Their whole tenor utterly repudiates his leadership in the more aggressive Irish movements, and he strenuously denies that he in any way instigated the Phœnix park murders. He says it is incredible that he should have for a moment involved himself in any such agitation. It would, he says, have been impossible for him to have belonged to any secret society for the purposes of murder and dynamite, and to have taken the communion of the Catholic church, as he has habitually taken it throughout the last five years. Independently of that fact, his home and business relations, a much-loved wife and seven sweet children, for which he had the deepest affection, were, he claims, quite enough to have prevented him from taking any such steps as he is accused of having taken. He says he could have had unlimited bail when arrested, need never have gone to jail at all, and might have made his escape whenever he chose.

Arrest of Postoffice Robbers.

GRAND FORKS, Special Telegram, Aug. 18.—Deputy Sheriff Dwyer of East Grand Forks last night arrested a man named Gleason as one of the party implicated in the post office robbery. One Riley gave information of a gang who were arrested last night by police officers in this city. The gang was composed of fifteen hard cases and was getting ready for systematical burglaries in this city and East Grand Forks. Two of them recently broke jail at Fargo and are held to await the action of the authorities of that city. The others have been sentenced to work on the streets. Gleason was examined at East Grand Forks to-day and bound over to the next term of court. Failing to get bonds he was taken to Crookston and lodged in jail. Riley is held as a witness.

Escaped a la Jeff Davis.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Special Telegram, Aug. 19.—The failure of the Second National bank of Warren, is creating a big excitement in that section. Kirtland M. Fitch, the cashier, who is short $80,000, shortly before noon yesterday left his home attired in woman's clothes, and taking a horse and buggy, made good his escape. Fitch has lost heavily in Wall street, taking the bank's funds after sinking his own. He was to be married in the fall to a sister of a millionaire, and the wedding has been postponed from time to time until Fitch could amass a fortune sufficiently large to keep his intended wife in taht extravagant style to which she had been accustomed.

Death Rate in Penitentiaries.

The death rate in the principal penitentiaries of the country furnishes a notable feature in the semi-annual report of Dr. Gill of the southern Illinois penitentiary; the variations in the different institutions being almost incredible. Thus, among New York prisons, while at Sing Sing the yearly deaths from 1,000 inmates number a trifle less than seven, at Auburn it is given as 12, and at Clinton over 20. The lowest rate named is 3, in Wisconsin, and the highest 77, in Mississippi. The practice of "letting" convicts for work on mines and railroads is declared to cause fearful death-rates in several southern states, and, on the other hand, the New Hampshire figure is 48. The rate in Massachusetts is given as 15, in Maine the same, in Vermont 25, and in Connecticut 15. Pennsylvania has 6 in the western and 14 in the eastern districts.

JUDGE BLACK DEAD

Death of Judge Jere S. Black of Pennsylvania, Who Passed Away With a Prayer on His Lips.

York, Pa., Special Telegram, Aug. 19.—Brockie is in mourning. Judge Black, the the central figure of Brockie, lies cold in death. His death was peaceful and calm, and his eventful life went out beautiful as the setting of a summer sun upon the cloudless sky. His death was a courageous one, and in hope of a blessed immortality. At 2:15 o'clock he breathed his last. Kissing his wife good-bye, he turned over on his side, and with a smile playing upon his lips he passed away. His two sons, Chauncey F. and Henry, his daughter, Mrs. Hornsby, and his son-in-law, Mr. Hornsey, and A. F. Farquhar, were present when the vital spark fled. Shortly before death had laid his icy hands upon him, he spoke with confidence of the future, saying to his son Chauncy he had no fear of crossing the dark river when his Heavenly Father awaited him on the other shore, ending, "I would that I were as confortable about what I leave behind in the world." When his beloved wife knelt by his bedside comforting him with her sympathy and love, he gave utterance to the following impressive prayer: "Oh, thou most beloved and merciful heavenly Father, from whom I had my being, and in whom I have ever trusted, if it be thy will, grant that my suffering end and that I be called home to thee. And oh bless and comfort thou my Mary."

The judge's illness only dates from Monday last, and from the first approach of the fatal and painful disease, he was perfectly resigned, feeling that it would terminate fatally. After his case became critical, and it was found necessary to resort to a surgical operation, he observed that the doctors were in council, and asked its import. They told him of the intended operation, and that they had asked the consent of the family. Good humoredly and with his accustomed wit, he remarked:

You have reckoned without your host. I am the victim and the only one to be consulted. I will not submit. I can hold out until Drs. Attee and Garnett can be summoned in consultation.

Agreeably to the judge's desire the doctors were brought and he consented to the operation. It was successfully performed, but blood poisoning followed, which was the immediate cause of his death. All through his sickness, although suffering intense agony, he was cheerful, and his great mind gave vent in frequent scintillations of witty utterances, and at times he repeated selections from his favorite authors, Bryant's Thanatopsis and the words of Lady Macbeth. In his dying moments the jurist lost none of his force of character, his geniality and brightness of disposition, and his flow of language, when not under the influence of opiates. Judge Black suffered greatly during his illness, but his last moments were without acute pain, and he passed quietly away, retaining consciousness within a few minutes of his death.

Jeremiah Sullivan Black was born in Somerset county, Pa., Jan. 10, 1810. His ancestors came from the north of Ireland and settled near the present site of York, Pa., the home of the statesman, early in the seventeenth century. His father, Henry Black, being a farmer, Jerry, as he was familiarly called, passed his early years "upon the virgin fields of the clearing among the glades," and his love of rural life remained with him through all his days. It also fixed his religious faith and turned him to the Campbellite church, which he joined at the age of twenty-eight. He received his first mind-training in the schools about his own home, but he completed his studies at a private academy in Fayette county. He had an immense legal practice from the first and in 1838 he married Miss Mary Forward, his preceptor's daughter, who survives him. In 1842 Gov. Porter appointed him judge of Common Pleas. He was made chief justice of the supreme court of the State in 1851. by drawing the short term of three years, after having been chosen upon the ticket with Lewis, Groson, Lowery, and Coulter, under the new constitutional provision, making the judges elective. In 1854 he was re-elected to the supreme bench by a large majority. Afterwards he became Attorney General of the United States under Mr. Buchanan. Judge Black's loyalty during those trying months is unquestionable. The late member of that cabinet, furnished in January, 1877, a written tribute to Judge Black's unswerving loyality during that period; and Judge Holt another of his cabinet colleagues, has said: "No man could have been more ardent or earnest in his attachment to the union or more persistent in urging those things calculated to save it from the designs of the southern men than Judge Black."

As a lawyer he was considered one of the greatest in the country.. Two years ago he published a vigorous defense of the Christian religion in the North American Review against the onslaughts of Robert G. Ingersoll.

Wood Finish.

The patented preparations known as wood fillers are prepared in different colors for the purpose of preparing the surface of wood previous to varnishing. They fill up the pores of the wood, rendering the surface hard and smooth. For polishing mahogany, walnut, etc., the following is recommended: Dissolve beeswax by heating spirits of turpentine until the mixtures becomes viscid; then apply by a clean cloth, and rub thoroughly with a flannel or cloth. A common mode of polishing mahogany is by rubbing it first with linseed oil, and then holding trimmings or shavings of the same material against the work in the lathe. Glass paper followed by rubbing also gives a good lustre. There are various means of toning or darkening woods for decorative effect. Logwood, lime, brown soft soap, dyed oil, sulphate of iron, nitrate of silver exposed to the sun's rays, carbonate of soda, bichromate and permanganate of potash, and other alkaline preparations are used for darkening the wood; the last three are specially recommended. The solution is applied by dissolving one ounce of the alkali in two gills of boiling water diluted to the required tone. The surface is saturated with a sponge or flannel and immediately dried with soft rags. The carbonate is used for dark woods. Oil tinged with rose madder may be applied to hard woods like birch, and a red oil is prepared from soaked alkanet root in linseed oil. The grain of yellow pine can be brought out by two or three coats of Japan much diluted with turpentine, and afterward oiled and rubbed. To give mahogany the appearance of age, lime-water used before oiling is a good plan. In staining wood the best and most transparent effect is obtained by repeated light coats of the same. For oak stain a strong solution of oxalic acid is employed; for mahogany, dilute nitrous acid. A primary coat or a coat of wood fillers is advantageous. For mahogany stains the following are given: 2 oz. of dragon's blood dissolved in one quart of rectified spirits of wine, well shaken; or raw sienna in beer, with burnt sienna to give the required tone; for darker stains, boil half a pound of madder and 2 oz. of logwood chips in one gallon of water, and brush the decoction while hot over the wood. When dry, paint with a solution of 2 oz. of potash in one quart of water. A solution of permanganate of potash forms a rapid and excellent brown stain.—Amateur Mechanics (London).

THE DUTCH EXPOSITION.

A Magnificent Display at Amsterdam, But a Failure in Point of Attendance.

A correspondent of the Baltimore American writes that journal from Amsterdam: International exhibitions are all alike, and I am afraid the world is growing tired of them, but in point of attendance this one is somewhat of a failure. The city, to be sure, as I have already said, is crowded; but the exposition grounds are so large and the buildings so numerous that it requires a very large number to make a show there. The exhibition, as a show, is grand. The European countries have all make great displays, while the colonies are represented as never before. This department is, indeed, most interesting, and days and weeks could be enjoyably and beneficially spent examining this display alone.. Every detail is complete; everything of interest has been collected and it seems as you wander through the colonies' building or over the grounds—where whole villages, transported from the Indies and South America, are placed—you forget you are in Europe, and turn to some familiar object, as a man after a dream pinches himself to see if he is awake.

The exhibition grounds are situated in the new section of the city, beautifully located, and cover over 200 acres of land. The entrance faces a grand plaza, with terraces running down to a canal. These seem embroidered in gay colors, for they are filled with large flower-beds of novel designs and vari-colored flowers. You cross a number of bridges and pass to the great stone building of sixteenth century architecture. This building is beautiful in design and elaborately decorated with stone carvings, friezes, dados and medallions. It is not quite completed and when finished it is destined to be the rijk's (government) museum, where the famous pictures, now exhibited in the Trippenhaus, will be placed. This museum is the best in Holland, and the best efforts of Rembrant and other Dutch artists are to be seen. You pass under the immense building by a magnificent archway, and emerging, a vision of beauty meets your eye. It is the entrance proper to the exhibition. An arch rises up before your eyes of dazzling whiteness and of design so fantastic and novel that you stop in awe and gaze at it. The design is Indian-Hindoostanic. Two great towers on either end rise heavenward, surmounted by an emmence pyramid of Hindostan emblems. Sphinx's heads, pythons of many heads, elephant's heads and mosques seem thrown together with beautiful effect. They are many times larger than life. At the base of these towers great elephants (twice the size of Jumbo), carrying storehouses of treasures, seem to be unloaded. The arch is of imitation marble, but is little seen, for a great India scarf of bright red, with embroidery and fringe, spans the space between the towers. This scarf is over one thousand feet in length, and the effect is wonderful. Flags, banners, etc., float from every conceivable point of the arch. Around the base fourteen of the large elephants are placed, and immense lions guard the entrance ways. Equestrian statues are in front of this wonderful piece of ornamentation, while the body of the arch is ornamented with bas-reliefs, the subjects being appropriate to the exposition. The arch covers many acres of ground. Passing under the arch you first enter the main building, which is nearly as large as the main building of the centennial. But, unlike the centennial, this main building has sections, or wings running from off it. Each section, or country, has a wing, (except America, which only occupies a portion of a wing.) The colonies' wing lies to the right in Indian park, the art galleries to the left, the machinery buildings on the right of the colonies'. Hundreds of smaller buildings, pavilions and cafes are all over the grounds.

Handwriting of Great Men.

The Duke of Wellington's writing was large and forcible, without attempt at decoration. During the last ten years of his life, however, his writing was different, and often illegible. None but a compositor in a newspaper office accustomed to all sorts of hieroglyphics, could possibly decipher the characters. A letter of his to a minister in Lord Derby's cabinet has not to this day been unraveled. Nine out of every ten of the Duke's letters treasured by autograph hunters were written by his Secretary, Mr. Greyville, who wrote a hand very much like that of the Duke in his bes days. Lord Brougham's hand betraye much unconquerable restlessness of impulse. His manuscript was a mass of heiroglyphics, and according to Dr. Blenkinsop, in all Mr. Clowe's extensive printing establishment in London, there was only one man competent to grapple with it, and he often gave it up in despair. The bold and careless freedom of Byron's handwriting compared to the elegant little prettiness of Tom Moore's reveals very clearly the peculiar qualities of the two poets. The elegant precision of Mrs. Heman's penmanship, and the free but clear and intelligent abandon of L. E. Landon's were equally characteristic of their mental peculiarities The royal family of England have generally written good, clear, and free hands. William IV. wrote a remarkably plain and legible hand, and that of his brother George was showy and fluent. Queen Victoria has an elegant signature, Locke says the faster a man writes the slower others reads what he has written. Napoleon could write fourteen pages a minute; unfortunately, however, each page consisted of eight blots and a splatter. Some of his lines to Marie Louise appear as if scattered over the paper by the explosion of a bomb-shell. The manuscript of Horace Greeley, the American statesman, was very illegible. A wag once observed that the sentence, "Virtue is its own reward," written by Mr Greeley was rendered by a compositor into "Washing with soap is wholly absurd." Another story runs that Mr. Greeley was once applied to for the character of a servant whom he had dismissed for dishonest practices. Some time afterward the man met Mr. Greeley and thanked him for the character he had given him. "Why," said he, "I candidly said you were a thief." "Well, sir, as it was impossible to read your letter, it was construed into a recommendation, and I got the situation."—London Paper.

Iron Mines on the Missouri.

The Missouri valley has long been famed for its wealth and diversified resources, and now comes the story that there lies imbedded in the western banks below Bismarck a rich and inexhaustible iron mine. Several gentlemen who has been exploring through this section, informed a Tribune reporter that they had discovered pieces of iron ore weighing from fifteen to twenty pounds, which had been washed out of the banks by the rushing waters. It is well known that iron abounds throughout North Dakota and especially in the sand about Bismarck. The artificial stone company is rejoicing over the fact, as it enables them to make the very handsomest brown stone, and gives them a more durable material than can be made any where else in the northwest. But if iron abounds in as large quantities as is represented by those who have just returned from down river, before many months iron mining will be one of the greatest industries of Dakota. Thus it is that every day adds new honors to this wonderful land, and impresses one more fully with the belief that Dakota will be the richest and most powerful of all America's bright galaxy of states.—Bismarck Tribune.

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR IN LINE.

Imposing Parade of the Commanderies Attending the Conclave in San Francisco, Affording the 'Friscans a Memorable Spectacle.

SAN FRANCISCO, Aug. 20.—The grand procession of Knights Templar, which took place this afternoon, was admitted to be an unqualified success. The entire population of San Francisco and 75,000 strangers have declared it so, cheering, throughout the entire route, what is the best represented, if not the most numerous conclave ever held in this or any other country. To the people of this city it was eminently gratifying, after a time of momentary discouragement. They have spared no pains or expense to return the compliment extended representatives of this coast to the Chicago conclave. As early as 8 o'clock this morning crowds began gathering in the streets, along which the procession would pass and by 9 o'clock Market street was rendered impassable except on the roadway, which, by police orders, had been kept clear for the passage of the knights. At 9:30 commanderies began to arrive, taking up the position assigned them in the streets off Market, reserved for the purpose. At 10 o'clock all had arrived, and at that hour the scene presented from the gallery of the Baldwin hotel was one not easily to be forgotten by San Franciscans who had the good fortune to witness it. On one side a mass of decorations, extending as far as the triumphal arch. On the other side four thousand richly clad knights, representing every State and Territory of the United States. At 10:30 the order was given by the captain general to move forward. The platoon of mounted police spurred their horses onward to clear the way, followed by a detachment of police on foot. The first commandery that led off was the California commandery No. 1, their silver embroidered velvet cloaks and plumed hats with richly caparisoned black horses, attracting marked attention. Following them came the Golden Gate and Oakland commanderies, the grand master, Gov. Sir George Perkins, riding a milk white charger, following, accompanied by his staff. Next in order came various commanderies of California, Oregon, Washington Territory, Nevada and Arizona, each preceded by their respective bands. These completed the three first divisions, after which, up to the tenth division, came commanderies of States east of the Rocky mountains. Among the latter were Washington No. 1, Hartford Damascus No. 2, Jacksonville, Florida, and Cyrene, No. 8, Middleton, Conn., who in the person of Knight Brainard Leroy, represented his commandery. Then came the St. Bernards of Chicago. The tenth and last division was composed of the Grand Encampment of the United States, led by Sir William Kuel, past grand commander of California. The regal Hawaiian been selected by the grand commandery of this state as the official orchestra of the conclave immediately preceded Barton commandery, which acted as special escort to Grand Master U. S. Dean. Following them on white chargers came Grand Master Dean accompanied by a numerous and brilliant staff. The procession terminated with Dewitt Clinton commandery, Virginia City, Neb., mounted on black steeds and acting as grand guard of honor to the grand encampment, and off the honors of the day. The knights first proceeded to the pavilion, where addresses were delivered by Gov. Sherman of California, ex-Gov. Perkins, mayor of the city, and others. Then they marched to Vennes avenue, where they were reviewed by the grand master, after which the march through the city began. It occupied an hour in passing given points. As near as can be determined, 3,750 knights took part, representing 366 commanderies from forty-six States and Territories. In a word, every State and Territory in the United States were represented.

The Detroit Record, in several of its past issues, has seen fit to dish up to its few readers a lot of old campaign stuff which in its idiocy, it imagines is calculated to injure our fellow townsman Paul C. Sletten. The Record in its issue of August 11th indulges in its usual screed and says: "His claim, because Sletten owns land in this county he is entitled to come down here and boast of carrying the Scandinavian vote in his pocket is in itself too good to require comment." &c., &c., &c. In reply to this we might quote hundreds of letters received by the proprietor of the JOURNAL and many other former citizens of Becker County, from present residents of Becker County, condemning the course of the Record and approving that of Mr. Sletten and his friends here. The fact is that the Record makes its living out of the taxpayers of Becker County, who disapproves of its course and makes its fight on Mr. Sletten who disapproves of its course while it quite overlooks the fact that not only Mr. Sletten opposes its pernicious course but also all who were former residents of Becker, who settled in that county at an early day, acquired large property interests, who have now moved into Polk County, and who are now called upon to help pay taxes in Becker County. Prominent among these are Mr. Jas. G. McGrew, Mr. John Hunter, Mr. John Cromb, and many others, active, all influential business men who have as much interest at stake in the proper management of Becker County financial matters as the Record and its backers All they ask is an honest, efficient management and they are all as actively interested in securing that end as is Paul Sletten himself. But the Record fails to fling any mud at them. From the reports of the present auditor of Becker County we should say that it is well for those whose interests are at stake to look into this matter of taxes sharply and to know where all of the money raised goes to which they have an undoubted right to do. Now, if the Record believes in an honest administration of county affairs, and believes that non-resident taxpayers have any rights that should be sacred in the matter why should it howl when they exercise the right of inquiring into the standing of affairs? It has been intimated that the Record is controlled by those who work for their own personal ends regardless of the rights of others and certainly its course would indicate that something of that kind is the fact. The Record, from the time it put in its appearance at Detroit has always opposed Mr. Sletten because Mr. Sletten has always opposed the old Becker County ring that has ever sought to control county affairs. The Record has changed managers often during this period but, by a singular co-incidence they have one and all unanimously done their level best to pull down Paul Sletten, which suggests that the Record is and always has been the tool of the Ring. Mr. Sletten has always striven to defeat that old ring and as he has always had the majority on his side he has always been successful. Hence the intense hatred of the ring for Mr. Sletten and hence the slanders which the Record promulgates, and just to illustrate how little regard the Record has for truth we quote what it says in reference to us: "it was necessary for him to depart between two days for the benefit of his health!" We need not say that if such had been the case we would not be apt to stop within less than 100 miles of Becker County and engage in business. The lie is too apparent on the face of it and we only allude to it in order to show to what depths the Record can descend when it chooses. It shows that in the absence of anything bad it can truthfully say it will not hesitate to lie out of whole cloth. As it has done in our case so it does in the case of Paul Sletten and so it would do in the case of any one who dares to oppose its pernicious course. It is that kind of an animal. Its early education and training was sadly neglected and we suppose it can't help it. It has to dance to the music of its bosses.

The St. Paul Globe crows with delight because the Aitkin Age inserts the name of R. L. Frazee for Lieut. Governor, instead of Charley Gilman, and says, "another Republican paper comes out for the Democratic candidate &c &c." Another "REPUBLICAN" paper indeed! How long since Ed. Barrett, the editor of the Age became a Republican? Was not that same Ed. a rampant red hot Democrat while he was traveling for the Globe and up to the very minute he established the Age, (which is just five months ago) and is he not to-day as much of a Democrat as ever? And if it would pay to run a Denocratic sheet in Aitkin would it not be the delight of Ed's soul to hoist the whole Democratic ticket? Yea, verily! that is a conversion! That is a very striking example of how Republican papers are going to support R. L. Frazee, that is!

The Crookston real estate fellers supposed that they had a sure thing on T. B. Walker's big mill going up there this season, and boomed real estate up to the altitude that it was beyond the reach of the mill people to secure what they required for piling lumber, and now the enterprise languishes.—[Northfield Journal.

You have got the wrong pig by the ear this, time Bro. Nettleton, entirely. Let us whisper it gently in your auricular appendage that that project is not half so "languishing" as it may appear from your stand-point, of observation, and you will hear something "drap" directly. If you had said "Grand Forks" instead of "Crookston" your article would read just like something we have seen before as applied to the greed of Grand Forks real estate dealers.

Land Office Business.

Through the kindness of the Land Office officials we are enabled this week to present our readers with a report of the years business from Aug. 21st 1882, till Aug. 21st 1883, as follows:

Number of Homestead Entries......	1,641
" " Pre-emption Filings..........	1,101
" " Timber Culture Entries.....	271
" " Soldiers' Homestead Filings	28
" " Filings on Offerd Land.......	94
" " Final Proofs Cash...........	878
" " Final Proof Homestead....	419
" " Contests..........................	457

We call that a pretty good showing.

While the editor of the Detroit "Record" has been wasting newspaper and ink publishing slanderous reports against Paul Sletten, this gentleman has obtained one of the grandest advantages for the people of this district by laboring successfully for the opening of certain lands adjoining the White Earth Reservation, which with the aid of our Congressman Hon. Knute Nelson, has been accomplished. We would ask; Which is most worthy of the confidence of the people? the "cheaply hired howlers" or the officers of the nation, who by their works prove their devotion to the interests of the people? But it is safe to say, that the people will, when called upon, endorse those who have rendered such valuable services.—[Kittson County Enterprise.

The Detroit Record is mad because Paul Sletten went into Becker county and secured the appointment of Mr. Torgerson as Deputy Treasurer, thereby getting away with the ring, of which the Record man is a member. Sletten will not mourn, to any great extent, the loss of what little friendly feeling existed between himself and that click. Paul is generally around, and as yet has not failed to accomplish his end.—[Norman County Banner.

Hon. Paul C. Sletten, of Crookston, who is entitled to some credit for his efforts to get the "thirteen towns" restored to market, publishes a letter in the last POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, in which he gives the credit to Hon. Knute Nelson. He calls to mind the fact that last fall Nelson's enemies declared that he was a railroad attorney, and would do nothing for the people against the companies, and now, before he has even taken his seat in congress, Mr. Nelson has procured orders from Washington that proofs shall be accepted from a score or more of settlers on railroad lands in that district, and all this besides the restoring of the "thirteen towns." Mr. Sletten gives these facts in the interest of justice to Mr Nelson.—[Fergus Falls Journal.

The Tier man has let up on abuse of the JOURNAL long enough to open out its mud batteries on one of our esteemed fellow citizens, Mr. I. U. Jennings, claiming that Jennings has "no public spirit." That Jennings' course will block the grand mill scheme, and a lot of stuff that no reputable paper would consent to publish. The editor of the Tier is the very last man in this city that has a right to condemn any man's action in this matter as that institution has not put in a cent in money, shore rights or in any other way. Mr. I. U. Jennings is not as wealthy as Mr. Walker and yet he subscribed $75 toward the bonus, and the Tier is in error (as usual) when it says that Mr. I. U. Jennings refuses to give shore rights to the few lots he owns on the river bank. He is willing to give all that Mr. Walker needs in the grand scheme by contract, but informs us that all he objects to is simply to deed away all his own right and title to the use of the shore for such purposes as he may hereafter wish to use them. And has he not a perfect right to say what he will do with his own property? By its immoderate abuse of all who do not happen to see things as the Tier does the Tier is more liable to damage the cause than is Mr. I. U. Jennings or any other man. Mr. I. U. Jennings in this matter alone has shown that he is far more of a man than the editor of the Tier will ever be for not only has done all he could to aid the cause but he answers not a word to the Tier's uncalled for volumes of personal abuse, and he has altogether too much public spirit to see that grand scheme go by default if it lies in his power to prevent it.

On Tuesday evening our citizens were permitted to listen to the great preacher, T. De Witt Talmage, one of the greatest, if not the greatest pulpit orator living. Language fails to convey an adequate idea of his oratory; he must be heard to be fully appreciated. The following article from the Philadelphia Press is the best attempt we have seen. The Press says:

He defies criticism. The attempt to do anything but listen to those sentences, now drawn out with a plaintiveness that will linger after his voice has died away; to do anything but laugh at those fine hits—that delicate sarcasm, mimicry that is the perfection of acting—or to feel so very, very serious when, in a moment, you are carried from laughing to a sober, solemn reflection; the attempt, in fine, to be in anything else but in complete harmony with the speaker, and to acknowledge his absolute sway, is so vain that it needs only to be mentioned and tried to show his power. We thought, last evening, as we looked over the audience, now unrestrained in its merriment, now hushed so that we could hear the clock's solemn ticking keeping time to the speaker's utterances—people seemingly afraid to breathe, lest they might lose a word—we thought to ourselves, here is the perfection of oratory; here is dominion absolute and undisputed; here is mind linked to mind, receiving its sustenance from one superior to its own, ready to acknowledge its subjection, equally touched in its soberest and merriest moods, now unsealing its fountain of tears, and, in the next instant, feeling a gaiety and gladness without alloy.

CIRCULAR.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.
ST. PAUL, August 6th, 1883.

THE ANNUAL SCHOOL MEETING.

This is the important meeting of the year. The law requires that it be held on the first Saturday of September and at 7 o'clock, p. m., unless a different hour has been previously fixed upon.

The deliberations of this meeting ought to be of the most earnest and serious character. The best men and women should be present, the best spirit, the highest and most unselfish motives, and the broadest views that the district affords should find expression at this meeting. Personal difficulties and strife ought to be kept far away. If any interest will make one see broadly, and provide generously it ought to be that of his children.

Notices should be posted early, although this is not essential to the legality of the meeting, unless business of an exceptional character (vid. School Laws, Sec. 38, Prov. Second) is to be transacted. But besides any formal notice, the meeting ought to be a subject of conversation and discussion by the people. The local press, which may be generally depended upon to support the schools generously, would do us a great service if it would call attention to the meeting and the important business to be done.

MEETING OF THE SCHOOL BOARD.

Preliminary to the annual meeting the school board should hold its meeting, and the accounts of the treasurer should be carefully audited. A full and exact report should be prepared of all business transacted by the board during the year, of all monies received and of monies disbursed. The board should, also, in its report, call the attention of the meeting to such matters needing consideration as have appeared to them in the discharge of their duties. Among these will be the following:

What money is needed for teachers' wages?

How many months school ought the district to support? [N. B. The law requires four at least.]

What repairs for comfort and comfort and convenience are needed in the school house?

Is it warm, with good flors and windows?

Are the stove and the chimney in good order?

What is needed for a supply of good fuel?

Ought the school to have better desks?

Does the blackboard need renewing, and is more needed?

Is there as much apparatus in charts, globes, maps, as a good school needs?

Has the school a Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, which can be purchased at the Department of Public Instruction for seven dollars?

The business of the meeting should be conducted according to the usual forms. A large number of the difficulties in school-districts during the year arise from the irregular manner of conducting the business of annual meetings. It will be well worth the while of meetings and officers to observe the following hints:

1. See to it that the minutes of the meeting are fully and accurately kept. They should be read and approved at the close, before adjournment.
2. See that all the members of the school-board are elected by ballot.
3. See that appropriations are definitely voted.

Newly elected officers must be careful to qualify promptly as acquired by Sec. 22, of School Laws.

D. L. KIEHLE,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

FARMERS!

That wife, and those boys and girls of yours, have worked hard during the year, have well earned a holiday and should have one. You now have an opportunity to take them to the county fair in your own county without much expense, and rest assured they will appreciate your kindness in giving them a grand holiday. Try it once and see if it does not do them and yourself good.

The Northern Tier got excited on Tuesday over finding the record of the contract between T. B. Walker and this city in relation to the mill project and announced that it is already an assured fact that the mill will be built. As usual the Tier is off its base. The mill is by no means an assured fact until the terms of the contract are complied with in the securing of all of the shore rights required. When all who are interested will consent to do their duty in the matter then will the mill be an assured fact and then will it be built. While there are few shore rights unsecured we are assured that there are yet enough to block the whole business and we trust that the owners of them are all too public-spirited to see the grand scheme fail on account of their stubbornness. We trust the matter will be amicably arranged but it is not as yet, we are sorry to say.

Talmage Interviewed.

Said P. De Witt Talmage when asked if he intended to reply to Mr. Beecher on Evolution, "no, not to-night. I need more time to deal with that subject than I can have to-night. I have already given the Lecture Bureau my subject for next year. It is "the Absurdities of Evolution." Mr. Beecher assures the people that scientific men are a unit in favor of Evolution. This is a big mistake, the vast majority are against it, and in my lecture I shall prove my assertion. The tendency of Evolutionists is toward Infidelity, and I shall show that almost without exception they are doing their best to banish God from the Universe. "Christian Evolutionist!" There is no such thing, it is a false name. Mr. Beecher accepts Evolution and then ploughs up Genesis. He denies the fall of man and he must deny the Atonement as well as other cardinal doctrines of Christianity, and what is there left of Christianity after these are torn away? No, there is no essential difference between Ingersollism and Beecherism, and Ingersoll's lectures will not work half the evil that Beecher's lecture on Evolution will work."

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, AUG. 23

County News.

St. Hilaire Eacket.

rom the Spectator.

Barley is being harvested by our farmers, and is said to be a good crop, wheat will be commenced on, next week.

We paid a visit to Mr. R. C. Jones" flowing well on Morgain's addition, yesterday, and were surprisep to find that the water which we supposed unfit for use to be very pleasant. It tastes some of sulphur, but not enough to hurt it, and Mr. J. informs us that if it is left exposed for a few hours the sulphurous taste and smell entirely disappears. The well flows about 15 barrels per day.

The large addition to the Europern hotel is almost completed, and presents a handsome and comfortable appearance. The upper story has been divided off into bed rooms, while the lower part will be used as a kitchen and a ladies sitting room. Mine host, Robbecke has now ample room for entertaining his guests in first class style.

Mr. R. C. Jones left this morning to assume the duties of traveling salesman for the wholesale house with which he was formerly connected. While here Mr. J. has made many improvements in Morgan's addition and has done much for the benefit of the town besides. Mr. W. Morgan has been left in charge of the addition during Mr. Jones" absence.

There are enough wild animals prowling around St. Hilaire at present, to start a good sized managerie. Ole Brink saw a large black bear, and F. A. Ranson a prairie wolf on the river bank one night last week.

Sample of the 90 acre field of wheat belonging to Mr. Sture was shown us yesterday, and indicates an enormous yield. Mr. Sture says he has been farming in this state 12 years, but has never had a crop which would equal this within five bushels to the acre. He thinks from the 90 acres of wheat he will thresh 2,500 bushels of No. 1 hard.

Miss. Emma McKinz'e, of Crookston has taken charge of the school north of here, which was formerly presided over by Miss. Van Wie. Miss V. W. has accepted the appointment as teacher of one of the departments of the Crookston school, and has gone down to get a rest, and develop her muscle before commencing to pound knowledge into the thick heads of the youngsters of that place.

W. O. Wilson went to Larimore, D. T. on Tuesday, to see some land he has purchased in that vicinity.

Miss. Maggie Brown, of Crookston, and Miss Lundrgreen of Chicago, who have been spending a few days with Miss. Cassie Mix, returned home on Saturday last.

From the Times.

W. O Wilson has traded his interest in the livery stable to H. H. Garrison, for a farm near Larimore, D. T.

Jens O. Dypvic brought in a fine specimen of oats grown on his farm four miles northwest of town, which measured four feet and ten inches in length and is magnificently well filled It shows that the soil in the vicinity of St. Hilaire is capable of producing as fine crops as are raised anywhere in the Red River Valley.

Seth Turner, from Chicago, has filed a homestead on a piece of land in the thirteen townships without seeing the land, and said if it proved to be sandy, he should set it out to cranberries and barberry bushes, but if it should be low, wet land, he would go to raising frogs for the Chicago market, and thinks he can make a fortune in either branch of industry. Go ahead Seth, we admire your pluck.

R. C. Jones was lucky last week in striking a flowing well in "Morgan's Addition,"—a splended vein of crystal clear and pure water—at a depth of about 140 feet. Its capacity is next to inexhaustible—for a number of families anyway—being about thirteen barrels daily. The water is slightly mineral, and may well be compared to the famous Blue Lick of Kentucky, or the Bethesada mineral water of Wisconsin. Morgan's Addition is to be congratulated on its good fortune.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

On Saturday the supervisors of Black River met and acted upon a petition presented requesting them to purchase a New Era Grader. A contract was entered into with the Grader Co. for the purchase of a machine to be tried on Monday and if it filled certain specifications the supervisors agreed to accept and pay for said grader. The machine prove a splended success and worked admirably in a part of the town said to be too stony for it to work at all. The supervisors were more than satisfied that the machine more than filled the contract and accepted it. Soon after the purchase a party quite recently from Lapland presented a remonstrance against the grader, numerously signed by parties, recent emigrants from the extreme north of Europe, from points so rocky and mountainous that it is quite doubtful if they ever saw a level tillable acre. Their fears had been aroused by false, and in some instances apparently malicious statements. Mr. Turner in speaking of it said: "I am pleased to think that I succeeded in selling them a grader, because I know it will do them good; they need it. I have often seen a colt refuse to go into a stable in the fall when taken from the pasture, although it will protect him from the winter storms and furnish him food, he needs to go there, and yet he will pull back upon the halter and resist with all his might, but by a little gentle force judiciously applied he is led in and enjoys the food and shelter. These men honestly fear they are to be injured but they will soon enjoy roads and ditches and forget they ever objected to being benefited."

East Grand Forks Facts

From the Courier.

Parties were in town yesterday, prospecting with a view to erecting a large grist mill.

Higdom's addition to the townsite of East Grand Forks has been thrown on the market.

The school bonds, in the sum of $2,500, recently voted by school district No. 3, for the purpose of finishing the school house, have been negotiated. The building is nearly completed and as it stands to-day is considered one of the finest school structures in Polk county.

The new school house is surmounted with a lofty cupola which is covered with tin, and as it flashes back the resplendent rays of the sun; presents an object that can be discerned for miles distant. The building is neatly painted and presents as fine an appearance, as many school buildings in cities 100 years old.

County Commissioners Brown, Gervais, Bradish and Higdem, in company with Z. M. Hunt and a half dozen of our most prominent citizens, inspected the county bridge at the point yesterday afternoon. Thos. White, the contractor, was present. The bridge is completed so far as the contract calls for, and all that remains to be done is to build the approaches. As the bridge now stands a sixteen foot ladder and the qualities of an athlete are necessary to gain the road-bed, The bridge proper cost in the neighborhood of $8,300. The approaches will cost a trifle less, say about $5,000.

Geo. A. Taylor, for the past six months carrying on as many different businesses as he has letters in his name, has suddenly departed from our midst, and his leaving us has been more keenly felt than was his arrival amongst us. Many who did not know him then, Mourn now because they know him too well. His was a glib tongue. If so disposed, and he had a purpose to gain, he could picture the devil a saint, and vice versa. His last grand business enterprise was that of opening a saloon, and he hardly sent in his application for his license when he rescinded the same, giving as his reason that his father was opposed to him selling liquor and if he would give up the business, his fathe promised to deed him 160 acres of land, and George sold out his interests here and left—a very bad flavor after him. Profit and loss, ye mourners!

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Once more the Bulletin cautions the authorities as to the safety of our bridge. The east bank is settling foot after foot, and the dwelling house on the bank of the river near the approach is toppling toward the stream.

In honor of the completion of Mr. Merrill's large barn some two miles north of here, a large party assembled in the building Monday evening, and passed the hours in dancing. A picnic was held also at the same time and place.

Mr. McKnight, who returned from the east last Saturday with a car load of horses for completing his grading contract in the town of Keystone, has already finished ten miles on the south border of the town, and proceeded to his work on the north Thursday.

The commodious barn erected by C. B. Rockwood last fall as a stable for his farm stock, his farm being eight miles north, was burned yesterday noon. The fire originated by some little boys playing with matches about the stable. All the stock, carriages and harness were saved, but one phaeton. Loss, some $2,200. The noon train chanced to be in at the moment the fire was discovered, and Jack Bunnell, conductor, with crew, and an active man by the name of Hanlan, ran to the burning building, freeing horses and saving the bulk of the property. Many thanks are due the railroad men. who are ever ready in an emergency.

On Thursday of this week several farmers hereabouts commenced cutting wheat. To-day great fields of the golden cereal are ready for the self-binders. To the surprise of the oldest inhabitant—when it is remembered that we were forty-two days without rain—harvest has commenced some two weeks earlier than it did last year. An examination of wheat ears shows that the kernels are so large and plump that they are absolutely bursting the hulls, and if left until ripe will shell badly when handled; hence it should be cut as soon as possible. Another lesson, learned by the history of the last three years heavy loss, is the necessity of the most careful stacking as soon as possible, let the expense be what it may

RAILROAD LAND OFFICE,
CROOKSTON, Aug. 25th, 1883.

To the farmers of Polk County.

GENTLEMEN: You are undoubtedly aware that the Northwestern Exposition or Polk County Fair will be held in Crookston, Sept. 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th, and a glance at the handsome posters spread all over the country will satisfy everybody that the list of attractions are of such a nature as to insure a large attendance at the fair grounds. The gentlemen constituting the committee have evidently spared no pains to make the Exposition attractive, now let us do our share to make the Agricultural exhibit a grand success, not only to show our appreciation of their efforts, but also to demonstrate to our visitors that Polk County may justly claim its prominent place in the great Northwest. However there may be a little difficulty for some of us. The cool weather after seeding has retarded the maturing of our crops and by the time we have to send in our samples of grains and vegetables, some of us may not be able to spare the time of going to the fair grounds to give the matter their personal attention. In order to overcome this obstacle I hereby wish to give you notice that I am willing to receive at my office, in Crookston, opposite the Merchants' Bank, and next door to Häck & Gallasch, from now until the 10th day of September, any time between 7 o'clock in the morning and 9 o'clock in the evening (except Sundays) all samples of grain and vegetables you may feel disposed to exhibit and that I'll see to it that such samples are all taken care of, conveyed to the fair grounds and placed on exhibition without any charge. When I received the order from the land commissioner at St. Paul, last week, to send him some samples of grain for the Minneapolis fair, I drove out in the country in all directions to select the fields where I was to gather my samples and found so many beautiful fields that it was very difficult to make a selection, and being allowed only to send one bundle of each variety I finally gathered them as I happened to strike them. Polk County is making a good show at Minneapolis, let us make a magnificent show at home.

Very truly yours,
JOHN KNUPPE.

St. Hilaire Racket.

om the Spectator.

Quite a number of our farmers have already commenced harvesting their crops, but cutting will not be general until Monday next. Mr. Carl Olson has his threshing machine ready and we understand many of them will thresh as soon as the grain is cut. Look out for reports of 30 and 35 bushels to the acre.

Rev. Bronson has been circulating a paper and obtaining subscriptions for the building of a new church in St. Hilaire. He has already raised in the vicinity of $200 and expects to raise as much more within the next week or so. Our townsite proprietors have signified their willingness to donate lots for the church, and we understand that the edifice will be built this fall.

One of the Red Lake Indians was in town on Friday morning last and had in his possession samples of a very superior quality of coal which he was exhibiting. Upon being questioned as to where the coal was found, he would not tell the exact location, but said that it was on the Red Lake reservation, a few miles from this town. He says the coal was first discovered by his father a number of years ago, who had kept it a profound secret up to a short time before he died when he confided it to him, but that he was unable to find the exact spot until a week ago. He states that the vein is a very rich one, and very near the surface of the ground. Indian chief Moosedung, who accompanied him to this point, says that many of his tribe have brought in small pieces of coal while gathering snake root near the junction of the Red Lake and Thief rivers, and says that there is any quanity of it at Red Lake. The discovery has caused considerable excitement and much talk in this town.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Mr. O. Wright and Messrs. Sid., Van., and Frank Lytle drove down from Carman Saturday evening.

Mrs. Judge Reynolds accompanied her daughter, Mrs. Hugh Sang, on her return from Crookston Monday.

Captain W. R. Russell made a flying trip to Fisher Tuesday, remaining over several days. The Captain has a steamer plying upon the Saskatchewan river, and has been there the present season looking after his interests.

Alexander Adare, aged 23 years, died at the residence of his brother, John Adare, who resides some five miles south of here, at three o'clock Saturday afternoon. No further particulars concerning his demise are available.

An old man by the name of Knut Salvison died last week of Bright's disease, brought on by the excessive use of alcohol. That whisky is a slow poison will be admitted when the reader is informed that he was 75 years old.

The chimney of Thompson & Johnson's general store caught fire last Saturday morning. As there was a gale blowing at the time some fears were entertained for the safety of the building, but fortunately timely aid dispelled any unfortunate results.

As the season for fall plowing will be short this year on account of the late harvest, it behooves farmers to work early and late. An acre of ground plowed early and deep will produce more than two acres half cultivated and merely scratched over, and depend upon it the result next year from this system of farming will be fifty per cent better. Hurry up the harvesting and stacking of grain, and if you are not prepared to thresh immediately from the shock do not wait, but put it in stacks, so as to commence plowing at once. Your wheat will command a better price from being stacked long enough to go through the sweating process, and the grains become more solid and plump. The farmers throughout the Red River valley are beginning to see that the only way to be successful in the production of cereals is to have the ground well plowed and of sufficient depth so as to withstand the drouths that are liable to occur during the season.

Thursday about one o'clock the community was shocked by hearing that a young man named Daniel Maguire had been drowned at the old steamboat landing some distance below Fisher. A speedy investigation by a Bulletin man elicited the fact that immediately after dinner the deceased in company with Thomas Hagerty and Daniel Buchanan repaired to the point for the purpose of indulging in a bath. After being in the water a few moments and when on the opposite side of the river, Maguire was observed to be struggling with cramps. At this period Daniel Buchanan was attacked with the same fatal symptoms and but for the timely assistance of the young man with him, Tom Hagerty, would have gone to the bottom of the river. By this time the first mentioned person had entirely disappeared, so nothing could be done but give the alarm. Search was at once instituted by a half a hundred men, but their efforts were of no avail until near about 8 o'clock in the evening, when the body was caught on a grappling hook by Joseph Lavalee, some fifteen rods from where last seen. The remains were transferred to the undertaking establishment of Mr. Darling and prepared for interment Saturday. Deceased was well known here, having been about Fisher several years, and was respected by all acquainted with him. He was reared in Ketley, Leeds county, Canada, being 23 years of age. One brother and sister living in Dakota and another brother that was with him are all the relatives residing near here. This makes the third case of drowning that has occurred within four years at the same place, the other two being Norwegians; besides these three other would have met with the same fate had they not been rescued from their peril.

Farm Notes.

Minnesota Tribune.

Preparing Fields for Grass.

A writer in an Eastern paper speaks of preparing fields for grass, as follows:

Every autumn there will be seen in the agricultural papers an article condemning the practice of pasturing mowing lands in autumn, hinting that farmers who do so do not know what is for their interest. When I read these articles I think they mean me among others. In preparing a mowing field it is advocated when finished to leave the ground as smooth as possible for the mowing machine to follow, which it does close to the ground, and if fed by stock they will go as low as the mower, and by putting the machine on again is just as bad or worse, for the stock leave something behind. When I prepare a field for grass, I do it in a way that will give me some tall grass, and to hold it up for some years. I set my knives in the mower up some three or four inches from the ground, leaving a stubble the same height, which protects the roots from the sun. I prefer to let my stock feed my second crop if possible, for I think it is worth a quarter more fed green than dry. The stubble holds the fine grass and makes a warm bed for the roots in winter. I think my way of treating grass land gives me a quarter more hay in four years than close cutting. I have followed this course for 50 years and would like to see the farmer that has better success than I have had.

[This is a new idea. We are not sure but what it is a good one. By observing this practice it will certainly afford good pasturage for the cattle, besides extending a much larger space of land for such purposes than is used now in the fall of the year.]

Cabbage Worms.

Since the introduction of the cabbage worms in the West, it has been almost impossible to mature good sound cabbage for winter use. There has not been so much difficulty with the early products, because the heads would ripen before the appearance of the worms. They have almost as much tenacity to life as the Colorado potato bug, as they cannot be reached by poison without being liable to endanger the lives of those who consume the cabbage. The pest has multiplied in such alarming numbers that at one time it was generally believed the use of this excellent and necessary vegetable was a thing of the past. We noticed among other remedies to rid the product of these worms that capsicum, or cayenne pepper ground fine or dusted on the leaves when the dew is on, is sure destruction to the pest. If this is a sure remedy it is certainly a cheap one. It is recommended by W. B. Applegate, who is favorably known to the horticulturists of the country.

How to Stack Grain.

A correspondent of the Pittsburg Stockman says: I have been a reader of your paper ever since it was first started, and have read with interest the many articles on stock-raising and farming, and with my brother farmers learned much from the experience of others. Yet from what we hear and see around us, we have much still to learn. There is no end to the farmer's trade. He never gets it fully learned. This is one of the most important seasons of the year. The farmer should have sufficient knowledge of how to take care of the harvest, and when to do his work and how. We have plenty of machine agents running over the country selling the farmer machinery to cut and rake up the harvest. If the agent gets his money he generally leaves. He has taught the farmer how to handle and run the machine, and both are satisfied. We hear farmers bragging about their machines, and see their hay and grain rotting in the stack. Go through the country after harvest and you will see machines where last used, and if the season is wet you will see the stacks looking green. When the thresher comes he finds a large amount of bad grain, which is often a great loss to the farmer. Who is to blame?

Is farming a trade that cannot be learned? If it can be learned, there are few who learn it. Many who are called good farmers have not barns to hold their grain, and lose for the want of knowing how to stack. I have been a farmer for thirty years and am still in my apprenticeship.

As this is harvest I will give my farmer friends my plan of building a grain stack. There are others, no doubt, more able to instruct than I am, and I hope to hear from them. I will here give you my plan. I build the bottom of rails, strong and level. If grain is plenty I prefer building ricks. I keep the grain level, and do not fill up the middle until about one-third is built. Then, if wheat or rye, lay out an eave twelve or fifteen inches, which protects the butt of the stack. Then I fill up the middle, placing the butts of the first filling, of course, near the band of eave or outside course. I keep the middle full but lay the sheaves flat, except the outside course, and build the stack with a proper pitch. It will be like a thatch roof when done. The longer it stands the steeper it gets. Build with a fork. Never get down on your knees. It never was intended for man to work on his knees, unless in some penitent manner I would just as soon think of stacking hay on my knees as grain. I have stacked for thirty years and never had any spoiled grain.

After several interviews with experienced farmers of this section on winter wheat and fall sowing of spring wheat, it is the latter that takes preference over the former; and, while some will sow winter wheat others will sow spring wheat late in the fall, so that the seed will be ready to come up in the spring. Among others is Mr. Kelso, who on the 23rd of September, will seed 20 acres of spring wheat as an experiment, which if successful will be extensively used in the valley. We would be pleased if others would consider this plan, for the harvesting of such grain would be so early as to enable those who seeded in the fall to cultivate thoroughly and avoid the rush in the short summer season. High dry land, well drained, will be suitable, as water standing on the seed would rot it.—[Kittson County Enterprise.

The Postal Reduction

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, to the Pioneer Press, August 21st.—The more important of the monthly questions now being asked as to the impending of reduction in the rate of letter postage are answered in a circular on the subject which the postoffice department is sending to postmasters. The following are the more important paragraphs of this circular:

All postmasters are instructed to limit their requisitions for 3-cent stamps and stamped envelopes to quantities that may be deemed sufficient to last untill the 1st of October. Postmasters will take all available means, without incurring any expense to the department, of calling public attention to the reduction of postage, so that purchasers may not accumulate an unnecessary supply of 3-cents stamps or stamped envelopes. No arrangements have yet been made for the redemption of 3-cents stamps and envelopes in the hands of postmasters, or the exchange of such stamps and envelopes in the hands of private holders. Until further notice, therefore, postmasters will not make exchanges for the public, nor will they return to the department the stock remaining in their own hands on and after the 1st of October. The 3-cents stamps may be used in combination with other stamps. The department will be ready to issue 2-cents adhesive stamps on the 15th of September, and stamped envelopes on Sep. 1st, in order to be placed for use on the 1st of October. The new 2-cent stamps and stamped envelopes must not be placed on sale by postmasters or used before the 1st day of October, 1883. Special request envelopes of the new design must not be used prior to that date.

Mr. John Knuppe went down to attend the Minneapolis fair on Sunday evening. He is now on deck ready to receive grains and vegetables for the Polk County Fair.

M. Rauenbuehler can supply you with harness for harvest at a moments notice. He has a full supply on hand. For repairs of all kinds call on Mark; Broadway, near the U. S. Land Office.

The reapers are running rapidly and soon the vast harvest of Polk County will be in the stack and the threshing machine will be telling the story of the number of bushels of No. 1 Hard per acre.

As near as we can ascertain harvest wages start in at $1.50 and $1.75 for common help and $2 for stackers. The man who can put up a good, solid business-like stack can get $2 per day for his work.

Our city schools will reopen on Monday Sept. 17th with S. A. Farnsworth, as principal and Mrs. V. D. Carruth, Mrs. M. B. Hayes, Miss Van Wie, Miss Bancroft, Miss Webb and Miss Wasson as assistants.

The Land Office was moved into the new building on Saturday last. The land office will occupy room No. 1 and the Receiver's office will be in room No. 2. The building is now all occupied except the first floor which is intended for a store.

Peter Cornelius got water at his new well on Section 12, in Fairfax at a depth of 145 feet but we are told that great difficulty is being experienced by too much sand coming up also, checking the flow of water entirely. The sand pump is at work trying to exhaust the flow of sand.

The base ball tournament, on the Fair Grounds bids fair to be one of the most interesting yet held in the Northwest. We learn that the Grand Forks, Ada, Fargo and Fergus Falls clubs are expected to be here and take a hand. One hundred dollars is offered for the first prize and fifty dollars as the second.

• Mr. Freeborn's cow, in attempting to pass through the tunnel under the railroad (probably with a view to crossing the Third Street bridge to Sampson's Woodland Addition) got fast and had to be helped out. She was taken out and taken to Bjoin's livery barn where Mr. Freeborn found her Monday night with $2 charges, incurred in the laudable efforts to save her life.

Supt. Carruth is sending out financial statements to school district clerks. He authorizes us to say that if any fail to receive them they will be supplied by addressing V. D. Carruth, Crookston, Minn. When Mr. C. first took the office of School Superintendent there were just 22 districts and 15 schools in the county, now there are 111 schools in the county. Mr. Carruth has labored faithfully in behalf of the schools and the cause would be served by his re-election as his own successor. So mote it be.

The work of driving piles for the new bridge to Sampson's Woodland Addition has been commenced and it is expected that the bridge will be completed in time for the first load of wheat threshed in Polk County in 1883, to be driven over it, and the mill will be ready to grind it into flour. The stores, hotels and dwelling houses, built there this summer give evidence of the spirit of enterprise animating the proprietors and show that the Addition is not all wind, but a substantial reality. We are told that many more residences will be put up over there before the snow flies.

A new race track was laid out yesterday on Barrett's place.

See Supt. Carruth's notice to teachers and govern yourselves accordingly.

Jennings & McGrew moved into No. 4, Land Office Block on Monday.

County Surveyor Brainord was in attendance at the meeting of the County Board.

Lem Nobles and W. E. Hartshorn are siding up and painting their residence.

There will be a social dance at Ericsson's Hall on the evening of Sept. 6th.

Tom "Be-Joint" says that is not his name by a long row of apple trees or such a matter.

The grading on Fourth Street near the school-house, is nearly completed. They are doing a good job.

Isadore Fortier has his cellar nearly ready and soon the walls of the building that is to be will begin to rise.

So far the weather has been very favorable for harvesting. The farmers are all hoping it will continue.

Kistenmaker says the old country is all well enough but too small to live in. Aint elbow-room enough.

The dance at Ericsson's Hall, on Tuesday evening proved an enjoyable season and a success in every particular.

A teacher's institute was held at Grand Forks two days last week. A large attendance and a good time.

Boss Hinman thought he would take a little recreation, so he has gone down to take in the big Minneapolis fair.

Bishop Seidenbusch, of St. Cloud, was in the city this week on business connected with the Roman Catholic church.

Dan McDonald is grading some streets in Jerome's Addition in fine shape. It will make a nice drive when completed.

The Walker & Bailey planing mill has commenced operations and the busy hum can now be heard in that part of our city.

Dr. Hale will give a series of Phrenological lectures, at Ericsson's Hall commencing on September 17th and continuing one week.

Chris Steenerson has been up in the thirteen townships on the scout for desirable land. He is very favorably impressed with the lay of the land.

Barrette & St. Marie are intending to move their harness shop into the room now occupied by the bar of the Canada house, the said bar will be moved into the building now occupied by Barrette & St. Marie.

The Tier outfit have kicked Jack Arnold out doors—or tried to—and now they are just gaping for items to fill out. Galvanized stereotyped plate items from St. Paul find a ready welcome in that office.

We are told that Miss. Ida Piper has been offered a situation as teacher in Buxton, Dakota, and has accepted. Miss Piper is an excellent teacher and the district securing her services is fortunate.

Mayor Stuart is putting up a large addition to his residence near the court house. It will improve the looks and value of that property very materially. When completed it will be as fine a residence as the city affords.

The new school-house rises slowly skyward, brick by brick. The lower windows and door frames are set and the work is progressing as rapidly as practicable. The brick are from Allen's brick yard and are No. 1 Hard. That's the kind he makes.

The term of office of Commissioner I. Gervais will expire this fall. Mr. Gervais has ever been attentive to the needs of his constituents while he has been in office and they can do no better than to re-elect him, providing they can prevail upon him to accept another term.

The first town organized in the thirteen townships was named "Sletten," in honor of the man who did so much to open to settlement this valuable tract. The next one should have been named Nelson in honor of our Congressman who so ably aided Mr. Sletten in his efforts.

The Land office officials have recived notification of the Secretary of the Interior in the contest case of R. Reynolds vs. B. Sampson, which is in favor of Mr. Sampson. This case, involving the title to a valuable quarter section of land lying near this city, which Mr. Sampson entered as a timber-culture claim, has been dragging along for two or three years, was decided in this Land Office in Sampson's favor, but otherwise in the General Land Office at Washington. A rehearing was granted and the decision was adverse to Mr. Sampson who appealed to the Secretary of the Interior who decides that Mr. Sampson is entitled to his claim. We are told that a new contest was yesterday commenced against the claim by Mr. Reynolds.

On Tuesday, accompanied by Mr. Sanderson, expert for the Reliance self binder, we went out to the JOURNAL farm to see the new Reliance machine that we had ordered of Lilly & Co., start in. When we arrived the machine was in the field with a Minneapolis binder, and, although the ground was wet with recent rains and the grain very wet with dew, the Reliance was doing as good work as any new machine, with the bearings all new, could do. Mr. Bartlett had not got the hang of the machine perfectly as yet and as a result, missed two or three bundles in going round a fifty acre piece. We found the binder was not tying tight enough but that was soon regulated to tie as tightly as desired. We should say, however that the twine used was somewhat knotty which was, doubtless, the reason that the binder failed to tie all of the sheaves. We were pleased with the workings of the Reliance and think it well named; that it will prove a reliance to farmers in time of need.

An excursion to Devil's Lake has been planned by the railroad conductors belonging to Maxwell Division, No. 75. The train will leave Crookston on Thursday morning, Sept. 6th, at 5:30 a. m. Arriving at Devil's Lake a boat will be in readiness to take the party on a voyage around the lake stopping at Fort Totten and other points of interest. The fare for the round trip has been placed at $4:50, which is less than one-half regular rates. A cornet band will go along to furnish music and there will be a dance upon the boat for those who desire. If you are inclined to fish or hunt you can take along your dog and gun and opportunities will be afforded for exercising them. The railroad boys know how to entertain right royally, and a good time is in store for those who go, and this opportunity to see the famous Devil's Lake country and have lots of fun at the same time does not come every day. The JOURNAL man received a cordial invitation to go, for which we return our hearty thanks and mean to "get there" if possible.

M. B. Hayes is hauling sand for his new house.

Mr. M. R. Brown is taking in the Minneapolis fair.

Clark Van Housen is on the dry dock for repairs—temporary illness.

Elm street has been graded down in good shape and is now a very pretty street.

Sheriff Zwickey is among the visitors to Minneapolis and the big fair this week.

The Northwestern Band are talking of giving a social dance every evening during fair week.

The Knights of Honor are talking of having a social hop some time in the near future, They always have a good time.

An effort will be made to get lower rates of insurance for the city. That is a good idea and we trust that it will be successful.

Wm. Kistenmacher is putting an addition to his residence instead of building new as he contemplated doing. He will make a neat and tasty residence.

P. J. La-Chapelle has three fine large elks in the yard at the Lake View House. They are fine birds. He talks some of buying out "LaChaffee's" interest and putting the elk on exhibition at the fair grounds.

We hoped to be able to get the report of the Board of County Commissioners for this issue but the auditor has been so busy that he was unable to furnish us with the copy. It will appear in our next, however.

The Times says that the Crocker & Cundy Addition to St. Hilaire has somewhat weakened—in other words has sort 'o busted as it were. Mr. Crocker is a rattling boomer and a good business man and we trust that he will not lose heavily.

The Grand Forks Plaindealer says that the Elk Valley Farming Company intend to summer fallow one-half of their large farm next year and summer fallow one-half each alternate year. This farm consists of 5000 acres, of which there are now 3700 acres in crop. They require 105 mules and 24 self-binders to handle the grain.

Whoever those parties are who go prowling about private dwellings late a night had better have a care or they may get hurt some fine dark night. On Wednesday morning, about one o'clock the wife of one of the railroad men heard two men prowling about the back door of her residence, which continued so long that she became frightened and and rushed out of the front door to arouse the neighbors for help. Fortunately policeman Misgen was close at hand who took the matter in hand but the parties had taken themselves off in double quick time. A dose of cold lead would have been good for them.

Dr. Van Dyke reports a sad reaper accident, which occurred on the Payne farm on Monday. Mr. Ralph Johnson, the manager was driving a reaper when the team got frightened at something and ran away throwing Mr. Johnson off in front of the sickle-bar. When taken up it was found that his right foot was cut nearly off just above the ankle joint and a fearful gash made in his right thigh. Doctors Van Dyke and Dunlap, of this city, and Dr. Chapin, of Euclid were immediately summoned and upon examination, found amputation necessary, which was duly performed. Mr. Johnson came to this country for the benefit of his health, had not a very strong constitution and the doctors consider his chances for recovery very slim.

About dark, on Wednesday evening the police were notified that a crazy woman was perambulating the streets with no definite object in view. Pete Misgen and Ben McKinney went on the trail at once and soon had the poor victim under surveillance. They soon discovered that the poor woman was as mad as a March hare, and, taking her in charge they tried to find accommodations for the night. It is very surprising how full to overflowing every hotel was as soon as the poor woman's condition was known, but so it was and the boys had to take her to the city lockup where they made her comfortable for the night. To-day she will be examined by competent physicians and doubtless sent to St. Peter. We are told that her home is at Sand Hill River and that she has been in this city for several days. She will doubtless now be cared for.

The New Era Grader.

All who doubt the efficiency of the New Era Grader and Ditcher should go over on Jerome's Addition and see the road just completed by the Grader Company and they are skeptical indeed if they are not convinced. The road is far more even and smooth than could be done with the ordinary scraper and costs less than one-eighth as much. The grader will build and complete a mile of such road in four days, leaving an excellent ditch on both sides. The town of Fairfax bought two graders late in the summer and now have 24 or 25 miles of the best roads in the country which is not only beneficial in that respect but will be very beneficial as a means of drainage. Next year Fairfax will complete every road in the town and do a large amount of drainage besides using her machines to keep the roads already made in repair. There can be no doubt that $1,000, expended for a grader by a town is the best investment it ever made, even where drainage is not so much a matter of importance and the New Era Grader is the best and cheapest road builder in existence. It will save more than its cost every year in building and repairing roads, and with careful usage will last many years.

Council Proceedings.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS,
Crookston, Aug. 28th, 1883.

At a regular meeting of the city council Tuesday evening Aug. 28th there were present His Honor, the Mayor, Aldermen Houston, Bang, Fortier, Stone, Braley, Pierce and Hanscome. The Commissioners appointed to extend Front Street made their report which was referred back and a special committee appointed consisting of Fortier, Bang, Stone and Houston to confer with the Commissioners regarding the wishes of the council. Petition of J. O. Mathews for transfer of liquor license granted. The vote was then reconsidered and the petition rejected. Lizee and Marchildon made application for a liquor license which was allowed upon condition that they pay $200 and furnish proper bonds. The Recorder was authorized to approve the bonds and issue license accordingly. Lee & Herrick petitioned the council for the improvement of Robert Street near their mill. Granted, and the Street Commissioner instructed to put the street in a passable condition. A committee of three were appointed to look up the street improvement question in relation to opening Loring street across the track. Braley, Houston and Hurlbut were appointed such committee. The committee to whom was referred the petition for a sidewalk on the south side of Fourth street, from Broadway to Elm street, reported favorably. Report accepted and sidewalk ordered. A petition from the members of the Northwestern Band was read, asking for an appropriation $25 per month to aid in paying their leader. The petition was granted, to continue as long as the Council sees fit. The committee to whom was referred the petition of Frank Jerome and others asking for an appropriation of $100, made a report in favor thereof. Report was adopted and the committee discharged. Bills to the amount of $186.75 were allowed, MARRIED.

MOE—RHAMSTAD.—In this city on Thursday, Aug. 24th 1883 by G. W. Lewis, Esq., MR. ANNE MOE to MISS JOHANNA RHAMSTAD.

DIED.

MCDONALD.—In this city at the residence of Marshal Daniel McDonald, MR. FINNAN MCDONALD aged 72 years.

Full of years and usefulness, the aged patriarch is gathered to his fathers. Finnan McDonald was a native of Canada where for a long time he was a man of great influence in political circles. He came to Glyndon in 1872, making many friends there and in 1874 settled with his wife and his unmarried children upon a claim on the Wild Rice River, two miles south of the point where Ada now is. He was one of the early settlers in that section and his was among the first houses built. He was called upon to mourn the loss of his faithful wife who died a little more than a year ago, and now, full of years and usefulness he quietly lays down his burdens and falls asleep. During his last hours, surrounded by faithful friends and relatives he expressed a wish to die, which event he realized was close at hand. The children who are thus called upon to mourn the departure of a loved father are Daniel and Mrs. John Fraser, of this city, Angus and John, of Turtle River, Grand Forks Co., D. T., Mrs. Annie Marshall, of Bismarck, Mrs. Hannah Thompson, of Grafton Vermont, Alexander, Ellen, Isabella and Flora Jane, who live at the old homestead near Ada. The funeral ceremonies, which took place in this city, were attended by a large assembly of sympathizing friends and relatives. The body was laid to rest in the beautiful Catholic cemetery, east of town, where, after life's fitful fever he sweetly sleeps the sleep that knows no waking.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES

The appointment bureau of the treasury departments hold the opinion that the civil service regards the appointments to be made hereafter as commencing afresh in respect to the appointment among the states, the first appointment, that of Miss Mary E. Hoyt of Connecticut, being that of the highest lady in the $900 class, without respect in the number of persons in the department from Connecticut. Appointments will be made irrespective of the quota from each state, until such quota be filled from any given state by new appointments. Then, however, the persons having the highest records—if hailing from the states whose quota is full—will have to stand aside in favor of the next lowest, whose states are now fully represented in proportion to their population in the new appointments.

The commissioner of the general land office has been investigating certain reports reaching that office of extensive depredations of public lands adjacent the Canadian boundary line. While the facts have been somewhat exaggerated, the commissioner is convinced that depredations on a great scale would soon follow. Of timber already stolen, a large percentage has been seized by the government, and criminal proceedings will be begun against the guilty persons. The secretary of state will also be requested to take necessary steps to secure the surrender of offending Canadians to the United States judicial tribunal.

The first appointment in the treasury department under the new civil service rules, was made recently to fill a $900 vacancy in the national bank redemption agency in the treasurer's office. The civil service commission certified the names of four ladies to the acting secretary of the treasury, who selected that of Miss Mary F. Hoyt of Connecticut, the first on the list.

The treasury department has called for reports from boards of immigration organized under the acts of congress as to their proceedings of the last fiscal year. It is presumed these reports will contain valuable statistical information, exhibiting the character and progress of the work of these boards in their administration of the immigrant law.

Commissioner Dudley anticipates that the publication of the pension list will make a great increase in the work of the office, because it will bring thousands of letters from every part of the country, protesting against the granting of pensions to persons named.

The comptroller of the currency authorized the Coin Exchange National bank of Chicago to begin business; capital $1,000,000.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

Cel. P. B. Grant, emigration agent of the Northern Pacific, shipped to Cincinnati a car load of exhibits for the exposition commencing in that city on the 5th proximo. The shipment was made by way of the Albert Lea and Kankakee routes. The exhibits consist of cereals in the straw and threshed grain, specimens of wood, coal minerals from Lake Superior and Montana Territory, vegetables, building stone and brick, and also specimens of petrifications from Pyramid park, in the Yellowstone country. The company will not make any exhibit at the fair in Minneapolis this week, but Burleigh, Morton-Stutsman and other counties along the line will.

The large frame building being used by the Milwaukee, Lake Shore & Western railway as a temporary roundhouse, at Manitowac, Wis., recently burned with four of the company's locomotives in it. All the tracks around the building were filled with cars, which were with difficulty saved from burning. The loss is estimated at about $40,000 upon the engines and buildings. Insurance, $20,000.

The Chicago & Atlantic has met the cut rate of $20, Chicago to Buffalo and return, and announces $10 as a round trip rate to Chautauqua. A New York dispatch says, as far as can be learned, regular rates are maintained by the different Western routes from that city.

GENERAL NEWS GOSSIP.

Dr. McCormick and Bishop Athenry are about to visit the United States. The object of their visit is to raise funds for the promotion of the migration scheme in Ireland. Two companies have been formed in Ireland and are already organizing a system of migration which they hope will lead to a great diminution of the prevailing distress in the crowded districts, and by a more equal distribution tend to develope waste lands, and promote agricultural pursuits where that industry has practically become paralyzed. They propose to render such pecuniary assistance as is necessary to stimulate production, making such terms as are reasonably within the means of the tenant. Emigration has been so unrelentingly condemned by Mr. Parnell and his followers as to make the very word hateful. Migration is now the cry, and its results are looked forward to with great hopefulness by its philanthropic promoters.

The late Judge J. S. Black's literary productions will be published in book form, and will comprise three large volumes. A short time before his death the judge told an intimate friend that he had been engaged in refreshing himself regarding the events of the time of secession of which Jeff Davis wrote. This work, which would have been characteristic of the judge's great power as a writer was never completed. At one time, when he was told he was out of danger, he said: "Well, I can attend to Davis now." But his work was never again taken up. New complications in his disease arose and resulted in his death.

Judge Lowell of Boston has sustained the decision of the district court in the case of the American Bell Telephone company vs Amos E. Dolbear et al., which was appealed. The petition for injunction and questions for decisions were whether the telephone described by Reis anticipates the Bell telephone and whether Dolbear's apparatus infringes Bell's patent. It is held that the invention of Reis was not in anticipation of Bell. Whatever may be the merits of his (Dolbear's) telephone, he employed in it at least a part of Bell's process. The decision is for the complainant.

Harry Dankoehler, a compositor in the office of the Sturgeon Bay Advocate, set 25,500 ems of solid minion in eighteen and three quarters consecutive hours. He picked up his stick at 6:30 a. m. Friday and dropped it at 1:15 a. m. Saturday last. Two cups of coffee at 8 o'clock p. m. was all the nourishment taken during the whole time. After four hours of sleep he began work again in the morning as usual. Robert Bonner, set many years ago, on a bet of $10, 25,500 ems of solid type in twenty hours and twenty-eight minutes' steady work.

A competitor at the Ontario Rifle association matches offered the register keeper $15 to give him a score of thirty-two out of a possible thirty five. The register keeper reported the attempted bribery of the council, and the competitor was ordered off the field. All his entrance fees and prizes were forfeited and himself forever disqualified from competing at any military rifle match in Canada.

Reports from different localities in Ohio show that the fruit crop is a failure. Apples, peaches and pears are very scarce. Grapes are rotting badly and the supply of all kinds of fruit is far from being inadequate. Potatoes are doing finely, but are high in price. Bugs and maggots are destroying nearly all the cabbage, cucumber, and squash crops.

The tax assessors of Newport have just completed the valuation of the city, and have assessed the real estate at $2,059,000 and the personal property at $6,463,400. Probably no other city of 1,600 inhabitants in the union can show so much wealth as Newport.

Ex-Gov. [illegible] Conly, postmaster at Atlanta and five attaches of the postoffice have been removed. The removal was wholly unexpected by the public. The cause is said to be general dissatisfaction.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

George Beattie, in New York city, shot and killed Mrs. Elizabeth Cameron, aged twenty-eight, wife of George D. Cameron the pedestrian, who is better known as "Noremac," and then shot and killed himself. As Beattie was to leave his position as barkeeper in a few days, and been drinking, it is thought that he exchanged bitter words with Mrs. Cameron at the breakfast table, and in his drunken frenzy shot her, and then killed himself. Mr. Cameron ascribed Beattie's recent actions to envy and jealousy at his (Noremac's) business prosperity, and to his declared purpose of getting rid of his quandom trainer as a nuisance.

Cabel Lincoln, a farmer living four miles west of Saginaw City, Mich., was shot and instantly killed on the night of the 25th inst. by his son Charles. The old man came home drunk, and gaining possession of a revolver, lifted it at the son, when the latter drew his own weapon and shot three bullets into the old man's head. He came to Saginaw and gave himself up to the authorities.

Near Tucson, Va., an express wagon loaded with Chinamen was attacked by three rustlers. The Chinamen returned the fire and mortally wounded an assailant. Four Chinamen were injured, two fatally, and the robbers succeeded in getting $3,000.

John Van Anda, a resident of Philipsburg, Mont., and an employe of the Hope mining company, was killed on the 11th inst., by William Queener, with whom he had an altercation. The latter has skipped and the affair is pretty badly in mystery.

The liabilities of the Vincent Thinkee of Cincinnati, which were at the time of the failure estimated at $600,000 are now said by the appraisers and assignees to amount to about $100,000 more. The assets at the lowest appraisement will reach $1,150,000.

CASUALTIES OF THE WEEK.

Shortly after Thursday midnight the superintendent of the county infirmary, at Zanesville, Ohio, found Lottie and Emily Littlefield, sisters, who had been admitted the day before, upon the grounds beneath their window, the first named dead and the other perhaps fatally injured. They had attempted to escape by means of a rope made of bed clothing, but could not hold fast and fell thirty feet. It is said the women had been in good circumstances till recently, and when the only remaining relative refused to care for them, they had to be sent to the infirmary.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

George W. Bromley, whose death at Philadelphia is announced by telegraph, was for several years ordnance sergeant, solitary sentinel, and entire garrison at Fort Miffin, on the Delaware. He enlisted in the United States army in the spring of 1835, served in the Seminole and Mexican wars, and was severely wounded in the latter. He was credited with having killed Osceola with his own hand, and Gen. Scott's reports bear witness to his having been one of a party of soldiers to plunge through the surf and plant the American siege batteries on the beach before the walls of Vera Cruz. Three different times he was offered promotion as a reward for his valor, and as often declined it. Last June, however, he obeyed an express command of the president, went to Washington, and was duly commissioned an officer and put on the retired list. He was the senior soldier in the army of the United States, both in natural age and in years of active service.

The state of Kansas had retained the late Judge Black at a fee of $7,500 as counsel in the suits to annul the charters of the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific for violating them in consolidating. He received $2,500 of it just before his death, which he called a dead loss to the state.

He also stated that he would introduce a measure on the subject at the next session of parliament. The Egg Dance In India.

The Indian egg dance is not, as one might expect from the name given it, a dance upon these fragile objects. It is executed in this wise:

The dancer, dressed in a corsage and very short skirt, carries a willow wheel of moderate diameter fastened horizontally upon the top of her head. Around this wheel threads are fastened equally distant from each side, and at the end of each of these threads is a slip noose, which is kept open by a glass bead. Thus equipped the young girl comes towards the spectators with a basket full of eggs, which she passes around for inspection, to prove that they are real, and not imitations. The music strikes up a jerky monotonous strain, and the dancer begins to whirl around with great rapidity. Then seizing an egg she puts it in one of the slip nooses, and with a quick motion throws it from her in such a way as to draw the knot tight. The swift turning of the dancer produces a centrifugal force which stretches the thread out straight like a ray shooting from the circumference of a circle. One after another the eggs are thrown out in these slip nooses, until they make a horizontal aureole or halo above the dancer's head. Then the dance becomes more rapid—so rapid, in fact, that it is difficult to distinguish the features of the girl.

The moment is critical; the least false step, the least irregularity of time, and the eggs dash against each other. But how can the dance be stopped? There is but one way; that is to remove the eggs in the way in which they have been put in place. This operation is by far the more delicate of the two. It is necessary that the dancer, by a single motion, exact and unerring, should take hold of the egg and remove it from the noose. A single false motion of the hand, the least interference with one of the threads, and the general arrangement is suddenly broken, and the whole performance disastrously ended.

At last all the eggs are successfully removed; then the dancer stops, and without seeming in the least dizzied by the dance of twenty-five or thirty minutes, advances with a firm step to the spectators, and presents them with the eggs, which are immediately broken in a flat dish to prove that there is no trick in the performance.

An Indian Agent Who Easily Obtained a Restful Position.

The president likes a good story, especially if it is quaint. An Indian agent, who came east not long ago to get something better than his agency, got it just for the story he told. He said: "Mr. President, when I got out to the agency I found that those Indians were just about to have their annual sun-dance. Of course, they invited the agent, and of course the agent went. It was very exciting. I had never seen a sun-dance, and I thought it was immense." And then he described the wild ceremonies at length. "I watched them," he said, "as they jumped and yelled, and yelled and jumped, and cut themselves, and marched and countermarched, and cut up like so many painted devils. All this time I was a spectator. But presently they began to pass the fire-water around. Of course, they invited the agent to drink, and of course the agent drank. In fact, he drank a good deal—a good deal too more than he ought to. It wasn't long before he found himself in the middle of the ring, as wild as the rest of them, dancing, yelling and howling. Then he was a participator. He kept this up some time, Mr. President, and then, it, is said, Mr. President, he got into a fight with a big buck and made so much trouble that they had to put him off the grounds. I don't know about that, Mr. President, but I know that very shortly after he became a traveler, and now he would like a little softer berth a little nearer civilization." He got it for the tale he told.—Philadelphia Record.

An American With a Title.

Anita Theresa Murphy, says the New York Sun, who was lately married to Sir Charles Michæl Wolseley, is a daughter of David G. Murphy, the senior member of the dry goods firm of Murphy, Grant & Co., of San Francisco. He spends little time in California, living, for the most part, in London and Rome. Though he is not very wealthy, there was a time when he had to scratch hard to make both ends meet. This was before he went into the employ of Eugene Kelly, the banker of Exchange Place, this city, who was selling dry goods to California thirty years ago. Mr. Kelly took him into partnership, and left him the whole business soon afterward. About a year and a half ago the pope made him a marquis, on account of his generous contributions to Catholic charities throughout Europe and California. He had been a count and a baronet. Though a singularly diffident man, he has a hankering after titles. His wife is a power in Catholic society in Paris and London.

CLAIFORNIA OSTRICH FARM.

What Ex-Commissioner Le Duc Saw There.

From a letter to the New York Tribune.

I have thought that an account of a visit to the ostrich farm near Anaheim, Cal., might interest your readers and give some information that would be useful. My attention was called to the profit as well as the practicability of ostrich breeding in this country some years ago by a young gentleman fresh from college, who has since taken orders in the Episcopalian church, and who prepared for me a statement of the case as it then stood, showing conclusively enough to warrant the experiment that an industry of importance might easily be built up in various parts of the United States. Having therefore recommended the business and tried without avail to have the general government do something to promote ostrich raising, it may be understood that I felt interest enough in the ostrich to go out of my way to visit him in his new home near Anaheim, Cal.

Leaving Los Angeles on the 10 a. m. train, I arrived at Anaheim at 11:30, having passed through a flat, well-cultivated country, largely planted to citrus fruits and vines.

As I drive toward the new unpainted building in view a half-mile away I see signboards with notice that all dogs found on these premises will be shot. And this emphatic notice is strictly enforced, much to the surprise of confiding sight-seeing people who have not yet learned that the notice means death to any and all dogs which may come within range of the shot-gun or pistol of the guardians of the precious feathered bipeds. Only a short time before a dog was shot at the side of his bucolic master, who could not comprehend the necessity of guarding the breeding birds from the sight of any animal of the dog kind. As I approach the house I see that it is one of the San Francisco "ready-mades," built of redwood. Ordered by telegraph from San Francisco, it was shipped by rail and set up ready for occupancy within four days from the giving of the order. It is a unique and tasteful rectangular structure one story high; shingle roof with gables; a porch along the entire front; ornamental brackets and cornice; a passage way six feet wide through the centre; two rooms on each side, each twelve feet square; and the whole building set up on the ground cost $400! One room is used for reception room, one for sleeping, one for kitchen, and one for the incubator and egg room. On the work done in this room depends the success of the ostrich farm.

A broad shelf on one side contains about fifty ostrich eggs of the brown Leghorn chicken. The incubator has been used for hatching these eggs prior to trusting the more valuable ostrich eggs to its maternal love. These ostrich eggs are a wonder to all who see them for the first time. They are regularly elliptical in form, weighing about three and one-half pounds, measuring in circumference 18x16 inches, and with a holding a capacity equal to a full quart measure. The color is a creamy white and the shell is equally pitted all over and porous in appearance. Sixteen eggs have been put in the incubator up to the time of this visit, June 20th, and the remaining eggs, and what more may come, will wait for the Halstead ostrich incubator, which has made a favorable reputation in Cape Colony in the specialty of hatching ostrich eggs, and which is daily expected.

These sixteen eggs were placed in the incubator on May 14, 15 and 16, and their period of incubation has nearly passed, for the chickens are moving in their shells ready for advent into California life. One came as avant courier yesterday, and to-day is a beauty of its kind. He is covered with speckled brown downy feathers except on the head and neck and legs; he is as wild, shy and active as the young antelope fawn, and, only a day old, is as large as a full-grown Leghorn hen. Uneasy and restless, in constant motion, and with inquiring eyes, he no doubt waits impatiently the companions who are to join him in his feather-producing career.

Preparatory to any nourishing food, he had placed before him when about twenty-fours old a tray of small gravel stones and crushed sea shells, subsequent to this tonic he had a handful of chopped alfalfa. This lays the foundation for a meal of cracked corn and water, and when this has been eaten the bird is considered on the straight road to distinction as the first ostrich batched in America. The bird will no doubt conduct himself or herself as the case may be (for the sex is not distinguishable for some months) in accord ance with the rules and regulations prescribed and enforced here for the successful promotion of the honor and profit properly due the enterprising gentlemen who have initiated this new industry.

Leaving the front door looking east I turned to the south, and before me is an inclosure of four acres in L form, made by a post and board fence only four and a half feet high. But this fence is made of three good sound inch thick, twelve inches wide redwood boards, well nailed on. A kick from an irritated ostrich would break an ordinary fence board in splinters. These parallelograms making the L are divided into twelve paddocks in which the stock of twenty-one ostriches, eleven hens and ten cocks are placed. Each paddock contains a pair of birds, one having two hens and one cock. The paddocks are bare and sandy, but surrounding the breeding grounds is an excellent growth of alfalfa, turnips, cabbages, onions, maize and beets, all of which have been planted and grown since March 25, and are on time for voracious chickens which are expected to rally round their exemplary parents in an all-summer campaign against the fifty-four acres of green food provided for them.

In close proximity to the paddocks is an artesian well 300 feet deep, which discharges four feet above surface 12,000 gallons of water each hour—sufficient to irrigate in this locality from two to three hundred acres of land planted to ordinary crops and with average rainfall. The entire farm is a mile square, or 640 acres, and is a level plain.

It may be as well to remind you that these are the ostriches, the arrival of which in New York last November attracted so much attention, and which Dr. Protheroe of Buenos Ayres, and Dr. C. J. Sketchley, both formerly of the Transvaal, Africa, brought to this country with the hope of forming a stock company to engage in the business of breeding fowls and raising feathers. A company was formed at once in San Francisco with a paid-up capital of $440,060, Drs. Protheroe and Sketchley retaining an interest, and Dr. Sketchley giving the benefit of his experience as superintendent of the farm for the present.

This enterprise may be fairly pronounced a success, for the company has more orders for birds than it can promise to fill this season, and at its own prices, which are $100 to $120 for a healthy chick four months old. These chickens will yield their first feathers when eight months old, which picking should bring, at present market prices, from $7 to $10. The next picking, eight months after the first, should bring from $40 to $50, and in two years, the bird, if well cared for, is expected to be in full plumage, and to yield annually $200 worth of feathers. Ostriches breed when four years old, and from a pair is expected an average of fifty healthy chickens every year, for twenty years.

EYES THAT SEE NOT.

Being of the Kind That are Exported to Fill Vacancies.

"We sell from 100 to 150 artificial eyes a year," said a Philadelphia optician, "and the demand seems to grow greater every year. There is a very large nominal profit on these goods, for they sell at $10 to $15 each, according to grade, but when you consider the trouble and annoyance the fitting involves and the time it consumes you can easily see that they are well worth the price charged. We never have a customer that is satisfied with his new eye at the first "trying on." Within a day or two he comes back and claims that the color is a shade darker than the good eye, or that they don't match in some other way. There is only one thing for it. We must go over our whole stock until the eye is matched, and our time and trouble must count for something. We have a number of steady customers who always buy their eyes of us and bring them to us to be cleaned and repaired."

"Where do you get artificial eyes?"

"They are made at Stutzebach in the Thuringian Forest, in Germany, and the works employ a large force of skilled workmen. It is wonderful how closely they imitate the human organ of sight. I don't believe there is an eye that cannot be almost perfectly matched."

"Do artificial eyes wear out?"

"Oh, yes, an eye wears out in about two years. The salt and other alkaline substances in the tear duct eventually eat off the polish and the inner surface becomes rough and requires to be repolished."

"We have some customers—nervous and excitable people—who are constantly changing their eyes, and not at all to the betterment of their appearance. Others provide themselves with several eyes and use them alternately. Their wearers must take them out at night and keep them in clean water, for the secretions of the eye would otherwise gather upon them. Moreover, the muscles that keep them in place require frequent rests."

"What, are the eyes capable of movement?"

"One of the great prerequisities in the removal of an eye, when it becomes necessary, is to leave the surrounding muscles intact. This is generally done by experienced oculists, but sometimes cases come to us in which the muscles have been remorsefully destroyed, and then we find it almost impossible to make the artificial substitute look natural. I know a pretty young lady whose glass eye will stare stolidly and solemnly at you, as if the owner were inwardly accusing you of some grave offence, while her natural eye is twinkling merrily at the joke that she is listening to or at something funny that she sees. Once, when she was looking into her pocket-book for some change with her good eye that terrible artificial eye twisted itself around in my direction and glared at me with a malevolence that frightened me. It was only then that I discovered that it was a glass eye, for it was very well matched. When I subsequently examined the young lady's case I found that nothing could be done for her. She must go through life subject to all kinds of misunderstandings, just because a surgeon who didn't understand his business had bungled over the operation on her eye. I know also, an old gentleman whose right eye beams with intelligence and amiability, while his left glares gloomily forth with an air of extreme disgust and dissatisfaction with the world."—[Philadelphia Times.

Not a Journalist.

"No," said the exchange editor, toying with his scissors; "no, Charley will never make a journalist. He hasn't the faculty of putting things, you know. He brought in a paragraph to-day about a rescue from drowning, and he neglected to say that the boy was just sinking beneath the hungry waves for the last time; yesterday he brought in a horse accident, and if you'll believe it, he not only didn't say that the horse had recently made a mile inside of three minutes, and the owner had refused $5,000 for him, but didn't speak of the horse as a valuable animal. No, Charley will never do for newspaper work. 'Tisn't in him."—Boston Transcript.

INTAGLIOS.

By the chance turning of a spade
In Roman earth to view are laid
Bits of carnelian, bronze and gold,
Laboriously carved of old—
Sleek Bacchus with his leaves and grapes;
Bow-bending Centaurs; Gorgon shapes;
Pallas Athene helmeted;
Some grim, forgotten emperor's head. * *
This one, most precious for its make,
That other, for the metal's sake.

A touch—and lo! are brought to light
Fancies long buried out of sight
In hearts of poets * * * bits of rhyme
Fashioned in some forgotten time
And thrown aside, but found to-day,
Have each a value in its way—
This, for the skill with which 'tis wrought,
That for the pathos of its thought!

REPTILES IN THE "ZOO."

The Manner in Which They Were Removed to a New House.

From the London Telegraph.

One of the most important events in the annals of the Zoological Garden was the transfer which took place recently of the reptiles and snakes from the various departments in which they have been hitherto stationed to the new reptile house, commenced about a year ago, and of which we have already given a full description. As now completed, it is undoubtedly the finest of the kind in the world, and nowhere can the reptiles be seen to so great an advantage Indeed, we may say that their appearance under the advantageous circumstances now provided for them is well calculated to turn the scale of admiration in their favor, and one may be well satisfied, after all, with the sale of the great elephant, when the funds thus realized have been turned to such good account. In transferring animals of the higher classes, and even of the lower class of mammals, some degree of intelligence, and more especially of affection for their keepers, renders control to a large extent possible, and little or no danger is incurred; but with reptiles the case is totally different. They become alarmed by the unusual treatment, and no one can handle a venomous snake with impunity, nor can any one be always sufficiently active in his movements to insure escape from fatal attack. Snakes, especially the venomous ones, have powers of quick action, and can make sudden and long springs; and the non-poisonous kinds, such as boas and pythons, can coil with the most powerful grasp, round the bodies of men and animals. Crocodiles and alligators have strong jaws, which may easily amputate a limb: and even turtles can snap with a savageness which no one would voluntarily incur. The tasks of transference commenced yesterday at a little before 11 in the morning, and was completed in the afternoon without a hitch of any kind. The greatest credit is due to the preconception of the means and modes by Mr. Bartlett, and to the carrying out of his instructions by his son and by the keepers, Thompson and Tyrell. Dr. Sclater, the secretary of the society, was also present during the whole of the time, and took great interest and an active part in the proceedings. The first moved were the small alligators and crocodiles, which were placed in the western oval pond, and seemed to enjoy their new residence immensely. The pond is an open one, without railings of any kind, but the amphibious reptiles are prevented from escaping by by the overhung of the rim of the basin.

The first snake removed was the very poisonous hamadryad, (Ophiophagas bungaras) a native of India, and an inmate of the Gardens since 1875. This snake can dart to a height of five or six feet, and its transference was prudently effected by getting it into a box, which, when placed in the new abode, was opened by a sort of trap door, and the snake hooked out by a long iron wire forked at the end. The cages are so constructed that by means of iron sliding doors they can be opened at the rear and access for the snakes can be made also to the adjoining cages. The whole fronts of the cages are of plate glass, in single sheets. By opening the intermediate doors the inmates of the cage can be driven into the next cage; and the attendant, entering from behind, can then cleanse the compartment and clean the glass front if required. After this the reptiles can be got back again. The rear door is on the back of the hind wall of the cage, and consequently in front of it there is a ledge the thickness of the wall. During the morning the hamadryad sprang on to this ledge, which is about five feet from the floor and about eighteen inches wide, and effected a lodgement on it by pressing its body into an almost rectangular shape, in which remarkable position it continued to move on the ledge until its head reached the ground, and then it completed its performances until the extremity of its tail had passed the ledge, when the residue of its body fell away.

To extricate the large pythons from their old habitations, of which they had been inmates for many years, the fronts of the old cages had to be taken out altogether, and in doing this on the previous day one of the reticulated pythons managed to escape. It was found, however, yesterday morning, under the hot water pipes, and was safely captured in a canvas bag. This proved a happy incident, and the creature was conveyed to the new house with ease and liberated with facility into its noble quarters. This is one of the largest, and its companion is the largest snake in the menagerie. It is a fine reptile, over fifteen feet in length, and remarkably active. Thompson and Tyrrell carried the bag into the cage, untying it, shot the great creature out, and then retired by the rear door. Left to itself it moved rapidly forward, touching with its bifurcated tongue the glass front, the walls, everything it went along. It then mounted one of the two oak trees, and wound and twisted itself over every branch, resting its head every now and again upon one or other of them for a few seconds and then moving on afresh. Afterwards its huge companion was similarly brought into the cage and shot out of its sack, when it commenced to move along the graveled floor, its glassy skin and its reticulated markings being shown off to the greatest advantage as the sun shone down through the skylight of the roof upon it, bringing out a purple sheen and a golden glint truly marvelous as it slowly drew one fold over another of its massive body. The cage in which these two fine snakes are placed is larger than the other cages, which are usually about twelve feet long. This really consists of two compartments, and is 25 feet from end to end. The snake was known to be of immense size, but as in the old small den it commonly lay coiled up in a blanket and was never seen fully extended, every one was astonished to find it stretch itself out to the full extent of its new habitation and still leave some portion of its tail to come round. It is not an exaggeration, therefore, to say that it is over 26 feet long.

In an adjoining cage are two fine West African pythons (Python sebæ), obtained in 1879. One of these, shedding its skin, took a bath in the glass water tank within its cage, and remained there visible in an admirable degree. Its companion wandered about the graveled floor, equally visible, and it may well be here to observe that none of the snakes will be covered up with blankets as heretofore. as the use of the blanket was simply for the provision of warmth. The necessary temperature is now perfectly provided for; the steam pipes are carried under the cages at a distance of about four feet below them; the bottoms of the cages are formed of slate slabs, and the hot air circulates in the interval and, thoroughly heating the slate floors, warms the whole interior of cages to the degree desirable, generally about 70 degrees to 80 degrees Fahrenheit, the temperature being occasionally elevated to 90 degrees when the snakes show a disposition to feed. Warmth accelerates their voracity, and cold on the contrary, renders them torpid and indisposed for food.

Later on, the huge anaconda was brought into another cage and got out of its sack with some difficulty. It was partially shot out of the sack tail foremost, and instantly commenced to work its way back again with tenacious persistency. At last, however, it was got out, when it retired to the opposite end of its cage, and putting its head up against the outside of the water tank, remained absolutely motionless. The most exciting incident in the day's work was the transfer of the great American alligator, a particularly savage beast, at least 9 feet in length. Its destination was the large central tank of the new house, where two other smaller alligators were already basking in the warm water, with noses and eyes just above the fluid surface. Having secured his long, vicious jaws with broad bands of stout webbing, he was captured in the canvas bag which was not an easy operation, but to get the bandage on his mouth was the most ticklish business of all. The first was simply to lift him and drag him out. No sooner was this done than the beast twisted itself over on its back with a suddenness and power completely startling. The mouth bands holding on, however, the animal was lifted bodily by half a dozen men and put head foremost into the water, in which he splashed with vigor. The mouth bands were then cut with a knife, and the monster, damaged only by a few scales knocked off and a sore nose, quietly settled to the bottom of the pool and gave no more anxiety to any one. Into the eastern coral pond the land and water tortoises were next put, and then a variety of snakes, some harmless and some venomous, were introduced into other cages.

The final operation was the transference of the two North American water-vipers, very dangerous creatures, the bite of which is said to be fatal. Each had been captured in a wooden box, and, so far, were well secured. They had been driven by sticks from their former den by the side door into the boxes easily enough, but not so easy was it to get them out of the boxes again. This, however, was very cleverly accomplished. Thompson entered the cage, and received the closed boxes from his companion outside. He placed them carefully over the water pool in the cage, and then retired by the rear door, through which he leaned over, opened the sliding lid of one box about six or seven inches, took the box up by the end, turned it over, and shot the snake out well to the front. Opening the second box in similar manner, he hooked the snake out by a forked wire, and then removed the box, closed the rear door, and all was successfully accomplished.

Independently of the fine wall cases of which the large snakes are the occupants, there are numerous movable cases in front of the windowed side of the new building in which the smaller snakes and lizards will be housed. In one of these are two small novel lizards, with remarkable spiney skins, from Africa; they appear to be very sprightly intelligent beings, passing most of their time in watching the flies which buzz about the outside of their cages.

The interior of the reptile court is rendered pleasant by flowers and foliage plants, and will undoubtedly be a popular promenade. It will be opened to the public on Saturday, at noon, and the bank holiday folks have a great treat before them on Monday.

The Greatest Horse In the World

Foxhall, by King Alfonso, was born in Kentucky, and was purchased for the small sum of $650. He is a dark bay, with black points, and the near hind pastern white. He has a clean head, light neck, a back a trifle to lengthy, but a good barrel, and shoulders of admirable power. He was the first American colt that ever ran in France. The finish for the Grand Prix was magnificent. Archer was riding the French colt Tristan, and as they came along the homestretch rode his very best, and lifted his horse almost even to Foxhall. A shout of "Tristan!" "Tristan!" was rending the air from thousands of excited Frenchmen, the horses were almost past the Jockey club stand, when Fordham for the first time raised his whip. A cut on the shoulder of Foxhall is answered by a grand leap forward, and the Grand Prix of Paris, with its 160,000 francs, is won by Mr. Keene. After his French victory Foxhall performed but poorly at Ascot, and English critics felt inclined to think his triumph at Longchamps a mere accident. They were undeceived by his splendid performances in the great autumn locals. In the Cesarewitch he carried 110 pounds, and won in a common canter; in the select stakes with 127 pounds, he again defeated, with the utmost ease, his old French rival "Tristan;" in Cambridgeshire, with 126 pounds on his back, he defeated "Lucy Glitters" carrying 91 pounds by a head, while "Tristan" came in third, with 107 pounds. Among the horses not placed by the Judge in this last race, was the Derby victor of 1880, "Bend Or," carrying 134 pounds. In the Champion stakes ten days before the Cambridgeshire, "Bend Or," with 130 pounds, had defeated "Iroquois" with only 116 on his back. But we must not rashly infer anything as to the relative merits of the two American horses from these performances, as "Iroquois" was quite 14 pounds below his Derby form. "Foxhall's" double victory in the two great Newmarket handicaps has had only one parallel, the victory of "Rosebery" in 1876. Mr. Keene may well say that his "colt is the greatest horse in the world." The Cesarewitch course is two miles and a quarter in length, and "Foxhall" came in ten lengths in front of "Chippendale"—an exploit of which the greatest horses in the annals of the turf might be proud. In the Cambridgeshire the finish was closer, but the great stamina of the American enabled him to struggle successfully with his less heavily weighted competitors.—Harper's.

PECULIARITIES OF HAIR.

Curiosities of Growth that Came Under a Barber's Notice.

From the New York World.

"Most men have some peculiarity about the growth of the hair," said a barber to a World reporter in a shop not far from the City Hall. "I have seen some strange things in my time. Now patches of white hair are not uncommon, and I have heard it said that they were caused by bruises, but I only once saw a patch of red hair on a dark haired man. [illegible] would not show.

"Another old customer wore two kind of eyebrows. One was shaggy, still and distinctly semicircular, while the other was perfectly smooth and normal. He was not ashamed of them, although he was very particular about having the semicircular one carefully trimmed. He used to declare that his father had semicircular eyebrows, and that his mother's did not differ from other people's. Then I remember an old chap whose mustache grew toward the centre of his lip, and he was compelled to keep it closely cropped to prevent it from invading his nostrils. Again, some men's whiskers grow around their faces; that is, the ends of the hair on the left side will point up. Haven't you noticed some heavy swells, whose short beards show a careful part in the middle? Well, no brushing will accomplish that; it's natural—what you might call a 'cowlick.

"Some people have a cowlick all ove their heads and their hair needs to be pasted down with pomatum to keep it in position. That's true of many mustaches, too, and nothing but the lavish use of 'Hungarian' makes them presentable. Nothing so much nettles a man, especially a young man, as to reflect on his mustache. In my young days men who wore them were looked upon as rowdies, and they were not the fashionable thing at all. Some mustaches never get beyond the embryo stage, and I have many anxious inquiries for something to stimulate capillary growth, but I have never known any of the many nostrums offered for sale to accomplish their object."

Current Notes.

Robert P. Porter, writing on "Industrial Germany," says: "An American could hardly observe an election in Germany without the thought occurring that the great mass of the people of the Empire had outgrown their institutions." He says political discussions are not so heated or excited as in the United States.

A laughable incident occurred in Judge Lawrence's office the other day. The unexpended balance in favor of the Interior Department amounted to $799.-991-2. About 2 o'clock a messenger from the latter department appeared bearing a voucher for $800—an excess of half a cent. "I'll have to disallow this," said Comptroller Lawrence, "as it is in excess of the balance." A general laugh followed, but the Judge adhered to his decision.

A remarkable counterfeit $5 piece was lately stopped at the Boston Sub-Treasury. It bore the date of 1881, was the exact size and weight of the genuine, and contained fine gold equal in value to $4 63.

Thirty years ago, in the heyday of the slavery regime, the total value of Southern crops of cotton, tobacco, rice, hay, hemp, and sugar cane was $138,605,738. The census report of 1881 shows that Southern agricultural products were that year valued at $760,000,000. Furthermore, the South is becoming a rival of the North in cotton and other manufactures.

Within a secluded enclosure on Columbia ave., Philadelphia, fourteen young women are practicing for positions on two base-ball nines which are to be composed of women only and are to travel about the country and play match-games wherever it is thought that the exhibition will prove profitable. The players, who are to be neatly uniformed, are engaged on regular salaries and their managers expect to make a fortune. Practice has now been going on for about a week, and if the street urchins who during that time have glued their eyes to the knot-holes in the fence, surrounding the ball-field are fair critics, a reasonable degree of proficiency has already been attained.

The San Antonio Express is authority for the following extraordinary bear story. A gentleman who was out hunting on the Nueces saw a bear go into a hollow tree. He made him come out, shooting him as he did so. Thereupon in rapid succession six other large bears came out of the same tree, all of whom the mighty hunter laid low. It is supposed that the hollow in the tree communicated with a subterranean cave, in which a colony of bears dwelt.

For half a century the farmers within thirty miles of the New Jersey coast have gathered at a convenient point along the beach on the second Saturday in August, to enjoy a holiday called "Salt Water Day." On Saturday 3000 men, women and children, in picturesque attire, proceeded in all sorts of vehicles to Wreck Point, near Sea Girt The population of the New Jersey pines then took its annual salt water bath.

The skin-tight trousers must go. An accurate and interested observer says that the heavy swells at Newport who have just returned from "abroad" have trousers much wider than before, and their sack coats cut in to fit the figure.

"The shad," says a California paper, "although until seven years ago a stranger on this coast, has multiplied since its introduction to an extent truly remarkable. They are now to be found all along the coast of California, and northward are rapidly making their way. From recent accounts, the "run" in the Columbia river is something wonderful, and at the present time the fish are so abundant that they are sold for 25 cents per hundred, and thousands fail to find purchasers even at that price. Pacific coast people in general consider the shad rather a coarse fish.

Chihuahua, Mex., a city of 25,000 people, is now building its first street railroad. A new state house and a new mint is also in course of construction. They are being built of stone. The blocks are being brought in on huge wagons with wooden wheels, the rims, or ties, of which are ten inches wide. The oxen are yoked as of old, by the horns, and goaded by a man with a long stick with a sharpened nail at the end of it. Blocks of stone weighing fifty and seventy-five pounds each are brought in on burro mules, saddle-bag style. One burro trudges along under two of these heavy blocks.

Rough on the Lawyers.

Cape May special: It seldom happens that an elaborate important will is so promptly and liberally executed as that of the late Amasa Stone, of Cleveland, who, as will be remembered, died on the 11th of May last, leaving a will signed during last December, and of which Mr. Stone's son-in-law, Col. John Hay and Comwell Mather, were the executors. Under the laws of Ohio the will was technically valid, having been made within less than a year previous to the death of the testator, but the executors and the family of Mr. Stone declined to take advantage of this circumstance, and not only paid immediately all its bequests, but added to the long list of beneficiaries a number of distant relatives who had been, as it appeared, unintentionally omitted when the will was drawn. It was specified in the will of Mr. Stone that all the personal bequests might be paid in securities, such as these stocks, bonds, etc., were subject to variations in value. Col. Hay, with characteristic fairness and liberality, paid them all in cash. The more remarkable feature of the settlement, aside from its promptness, was the adjustment of the claims of the Stone estate against the bankrupt Chicago Rolling-mill company, of which Mr. A. B. Stone, brother of the deceased, was formerly the president. Mr. Amasa Stone owned the stock and bonds of the company to the amount of about $220,000, and had beside loaned its manager at various times $1,000,000 to help them through accumulating difficulties. For these loans Mr. Stone held at the time of his death mortgage notes which formed a first lien upon the assets of the company, so that the executor of his will had only to enforce those claims, wreck the concern and recover most or all of their money. Instead of this, the family of Mr. Stone gave up and cancelled the entire $1,220,000 of stock bonds and notes, stipulating only that the Chicago company $800,000 of its paper held by other parties on which Messrs. Amasa and A. B. Stone were joint indorsers. This generous action rescued Mr. A. B. Stone from what would have been to him a serious financial liability, and cleared the ground for a reorganization of the company, which is now in progress under the Presidency of Mr. Porter, of Chicago.

Sir Walter Raleigh Before His Execution.

From the Gentleman's Magazine.

The eve of the day fixed for his execution Raleigh had taken a final farewell of his wife, and the interview between the two had lasted until the abbey had tolled the hour of 12. All business matters had been settled, and there was nothing, therefore, on the mind of the condemned man to interfere with his hopes and thoughts as to the unseen world into which he was about to enter. The king, as a last favor had granted the wife, speedily to be made a widow, permission to bury the body of her husband after the headsman had done his fell work. "It is well, dear Bessie," said Raleigh, pressing her in the agony of a last embrace, "that thou mayst dispose of that dead which thou had'st not always the disposing of when alive." So those two parted never more to meet on this side "the eternal silence." "God hold me in my wits!" sighed the poor dame as she entered her coach stationed under the very shadow of the scaffold, upon which in a few brief hours the blood of her husband was to be shed. As eight o'clock struck Raleigh held himself in readiness to quit the Gate house. A cup of excellent sack was now brought him, which he drank at a quaff. He was asked how he liked it. "As the fellow," he replied, "who drinking of St. Giles' bowl on his way to Tyburn, said, it was a good drink if a man might tarry by it." After this refreshment a procession was made to the scaffold at the head of which walked the dean of Westminister. On the way to the Old Palace yard Raleigh met Sir Hugh Breton, an old friend, whom he had especially requested to be present at the execution. "Sir Hugh, to make sure work, got a letter from Secretary Lake to the sheriff to see him placed conveniently, and meeting them the (procession) as they came near to the scaffold delivered his letter. But the sheriff by mishap had left his spectacles at home, and put the letter in his pocket; in the meanwhile, Sir Hugh being thrust aside by the crowd, Sir Walter bade him farewell, saying "I do not know what shift you will make, but I am sure to have a place." It was a bitterly cold October morning, rendered all the more sharp by a cutting east wind, and as Raleigh ascended the scaffold and prepared to address the mob that thronged the palace yard his limbs, enfeebled by confinement and ill-health, trembled so visibly that he could scarcely support himself. The sheriff, observing this debility, offered to help his ill-fated charge down from the scaffold and take him to a fire, so that being warmed he might be the better able to deliever his dying speech. "No, good Mr. Sheriff," said Raleigh, "let us dispatch, for within this quarter of an hour mine ague will come upon me, and if I be not dead before then mine enemies will say that I quake for fear." Then, holding on by the rail of the scaffold, he faced the crowd and thus began: "I thank God heartily that He has brought me into the light to die, and that He hath not suffered me to die in the dark prison of the tower, where I have suffered a great deal of misery and cruel sickness, and I thank God that my fever hath not taken me at the time, as I prayed to God it might not." After this preface he proceeded to deal with the charges brought against him. He denied that he ever entered into any plot with France, though he admitted, to save his life, he had attempted to escape into France. He denied that he had ever been counselled by Lord Carew and other lords to fly the country, or that he had ever offered Sir Lewis Stukely money to assist him in escaping. "But, indeed," he acknowledged, "I showed him a letter that if he would go with me there should be order taken for his debts when he was gone; neither had I £10,000 to give him, for if I had so much I could have made my peace better with it other ways than in giving it to Stukely." He declared that his only object in starting for Guiana was to discover the mine which really existed there. He denied that he ever intended to desert his men when at Trinidad, as had been alleged, or that he had been forced to return home by his men against his will. Nor was it true that he had carried with him to sea numerous pieces, and that the only object of his voyage was to get money into his hands he had taken out but little money, and such as he had taken out he had brought back. "These be the material points," he concluded, "I thought good to speak of, and I am now at this instant to render up an account to God; and I protest, as I appear before Him, this that I have spoken is true, and I hope I shall be believed."

THE FIGHTING APACHES.

General Crook Describes the Peculiarities of the "Best Fighters in the World."

Interview with General Crook in the New York Herald, July 8.

There is a great difference between fighting Indians and fighting white men The savages always get in a position where they will be shielded, and only fight when they want to, and our soldiers are forced to fight whether they want to or not, and these scouts know better how to surprise them than our soldiers, for they are intelligent warriors and take advantage of every little circumstance. Every Indian is a general and knows exactly what to do under any circumstances. He knows which is the best position for him and how to take the enemy at a disadvantage. He is always under all conditions perfectly self-possessed, and there is an individuality about him at all times. The soldier is mechanical and part of a great machine, and thereby looses his individuality. If [illegible] a lot of Indian boys are in front of us they will drop on that point and make as much of it as a Cæsar, Napoleon, or Hannibal could do, for they will be exactly right, and that is all the best general in the world could do. The Apaches are the shrewdest and best fighters in the world. They will strip themselves and ascend a precipice like a cat, and they will do all this after making a day's march. During this expedition they danced through one night, to the discomfort of our soldiers, who were trying to sleep, marched all day, and climbed places where a coyote would have trouble in getting. I have known them to run suddenly on a quail and kill it with a stone, and run down a wounded antelope. They are just as much smarter than other Indians as anybody could be. They have wonderfully good eyesight, being able to follow a trail on a starlight night as well as I could in daylight. Evidences of their prowess are visible all through that country, and they and the Mexicans have been fighting for hundreds of years, and upon every hand are to be seen the remains of Pueblo settlements which have evidently been wiped out by the Indians, and it is a tradition among the people of that section that the Apache is unconquerable. Yet they have wiped out every band of Pueblo Indians, except the Moquis and Zunis, whom I am satisfied are the same class of people. I have seen these fellows ambuscade in a place as level as a floor.

There was a wagon train in 1871 going out of Arizona into California, with an advance. The Indians saw them coming and ambuscaded in the road, which was perfectly level, with here and there a clump of grass. The Apaches lay upon their stomachs, threw dust over themselves and tied grass in their hair and were passed by the escort unnoticed. After the escort was some distance off the Indians jumped up and captured the wagons in the rear and killed the teamsters. These fellows take all the chances whereas other Indians seek a place where they will be safe and shoot the enemy. Peaches, our principal Apache guide, knows that whole country, and we left everything to him. I was not afraid to trust him, and I believe I am the only man who has used these Indians against each other. I do not know now to describe the way it is done, but I never met a case of treachery. I have taken these same Indians in a battle who were in open arms against me and have had them to turn around immediately against their own people. Peaches came in on that raiding party that killed McComas and took their little boy a prisoner. Just before the expedition had started out he was brought to me in irons. I took the irons off, and he accompanied us and did the most valuable service, for he was the only man who knew the strongholds of the hostiles, and he led us directly into them. Peaches is a full-blooded Apache Indian, and a member of the Chiricahuas band. He had two wives among the Chiricahuas. Peaches did not, of course, know the names of the mountains, and, like all Indians, has no idea of distance as to miles. He computes distance by the day's travel, and that is very uncertain, so that we could not form any idea of how far down we had to go when he put it upon the basis of number of day's travel it would require to bring us to the objective point, as some days we traveled further than other days.

A Duel That Was Not Fought.

From the Boston Post.

There is a man in New Orleans who makes a good living as a compromiser of quarrels. He is a sharp lawyer, with a conciliatory temper and an oily tongue. While other men are stirring up strife he is turning away wrath—for a consideration. He made a good deal of money in the good old days so fast receding, when a duel before breakfast was as indispensable to the happiness of the Crescent City as fish on Friday. Hot with wine two young bloods would quarrel. The lie would pass and then a challenge. Now you see things more clearly through the cool gray morning air than through the cigarette smoke of a cafe, and very often this clearness of vision comes while you look through the quivering blue atmosphere at the sparkling stars of the midnight sky. Hence it was that our friend the peacemaker was never out of a job. His title was "second" usually, but his business was to see that no necessity arose for his services as such. One case is a good sample. A young society man had called another society man a coward, with the avowed purpose of making him fight a duel. Of course, both were well brandied when the insult was given. A challenge passed at once, but by the time it had been received, Mr. Insulter had grown cool and cautious. He asked Mr. Compromise to act as his second. "Now," said the latter, "to come to the point at once, do you want to fight?" "Between ourselves," responded the young man, "I don't." "Do you want to go on the field at all," asked the second; "because it will cost you more to get out of the duel after you are once face to face." "I don't want to go on the field at all," said the principal, "and I don't care what it costs to keep off." "Very well," said the second; "now, sit down and write just such an acceptance as I tell you to write." "Acceptance?" "Yes, certainly. Let me manage this affair," said the second, "in my own way. Now, write out an acceptance in the usual form and put in for weapons rifles and for distance two paces." "Why, that's muzzle to breast, murder outright!" exclaimed the principal. "Write what I tell you," said the second. When it was written the second carried it himself to the secon of the challenger. "Why, this is butchery," said the latter second; "butchery in cold blood. Neither man could possibly survive." "Then do I understand that you wish to negotiate?" asked the other in his blandest tones. "We certainly do," said the challenger's second. "Very well, I'll see about it," said the challenged party's second. Of course that duel never came off.

Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Mr. John P. Jewett of Boston, the original publisher of Uncle Tom's Cabin in a recent interview with a correspondent of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, was asked:

"How did you come to be publisher of Uncle Tom's Cabin?'

"I suspect," he replied, "it was principally because I was a rapid anti-slavery man, although the fact that I had previously been the publisher of a book by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher may have had something to do with it. After a careful examination I concluded that the story would not only repay the cost of the publication in book form, but would yield some profit. Possibly I was helped to that conclusion by my firm conviction that the volume would have a strong anti-slavery document, at all events, I expresses a willingness to publish it, and the next thing was to arrange the terms. Professor Stowe was in favor of selling the manuscript for a sum down. "I tell wife," said he to me, 'that if she can get a good black silk dress or $50 in money for the story, she had better take it."'

"Do you believe that you could have bought the story for $50?"

"I believe I could have bought it for $25."

"So large were the orders for the book that from the day I first began to print it the eight presses never stopped day nor night save Sundays, for six months, and even then there were complaints that [illegible]

"How did they receive your information?"

"They seemed a little dazed by the news. The sum was so vastly beyond anything they expected or had heretofore possessed, that it appeared to them like a great fortune. When they called at my office, I handed Prof. Stowe my check for $10,000, payable to his order. Neither the professor nor Mrs. Stowe had ever before received a check, they told me, and they did not know what to do with it, or how to get the money it represented. I explained to the professor that he must endorse the check and present it for payment. I advised him to deposit the money in the same bank. We went thither together. I introduced him to the president, and the professor opened an account. After instructing him how to keep his check book and so on, and cautioning him and his wife never to go about, with more than $5 in their pockets I bade them good-bye, and they went their way rejoicing. When I gave them a second check for $10,000 I found they needed no further instructions."

"How many copies of 'Uncle Tom' did you publish?"

"More than 320,000 sets of two volumes each were published in the first year. After that the demand fell off."

How Was Man Distributed on The Earth?

The question arises, how has the human race been able to spread itself over the whole surface of the globe. Is it the product of different and independent origins in the several continents, or have all men sprung from a common cradle, a "mother-region?" On this point students are divided, Agassiz holding that men were created, and Carl Vogt that they were developed, at different centers, and Quaterfages and the theologians maintaining the unity of their origin. The fact is left that the man, the same in all the essential characteristics of the species, has advanced into all the habitable parts of the globe, and that not recently, and when provided with all the resources that experience and inventive genius could put at his disposal, but when still young and ignorant. It was then that, weak and almost naked, having only just got fire and a few rude arms with which to defend itself and procure food, the human race conquered the world and spread itself from within the Arctic circle to Terra del Fuego, from the Samoyed country to Van Diemen's Land, from North Cape to Cape of Good Hope. It is this primitive exodus, as certain as it is inconceivable, accepted by science as well as by dogma, that we have to explain or at least to make probable, and that in an age when it is only after the most wonderful discoveries, by the aid of the most powerful machinery for navigation, through the boldest and most adventurous enterprise, that civilized man has been able to flatter himself that he has at last gone as far as infant man went in an age that is so far removed from us as to baffle all calculations.

We must insist on this point, for it brings into light an obstacle which those who have tried to trace out the connection between widely separated races, and to determine the course that had been followed by tribes now separated by oceans and vast expanses have hitherto found insurmountable, for, if man is one—to which we are ready to agree—we must assign a single point of departure for his migrations. In these migrations, man has gone wherever he could, and, at every spot he has occupied and settled, has acquired characteristics peculiar to the place. Hence the varieties in human races. Some of these spots seem to have been peculiarly favorable to his advancement, and became centers of civilization. The numbers of such centers is, however, very limited, and their distribution is significant.—M. G. De. Saporta, in Popular Science Monthly.

An Uncommon Duel.

Gus Davis, of Philadelphia, came to Camp Rio Pecos, N. M., some months ago, and was engaged as a cattle herder by Mr. John Shure, a wealthy stock owner. Davis soon showed himself to be a useful man, and gained the esteem of his employer and the envy of the other herders. In less than three months he had resisted so many temptations to quarrel with his Mexican associates that he was nicknamed "The Northern Coward."

One morning, about three weeks ago, while Davis was on duty looking after his cattle, Jesus Garcic, a Mexican, saluted him, as usual with "Good morning, Northern Coward."

Human endurance has its limit, and Mr Davis thought he had been insulted long enough. The Mexican was at first surprised at the stand taken by the Philadelphian, but word brought on word, until each determined that the other must die.

The quarrel soon brought all the neighboring cowboys to the spot. The mode of combat was speedily arranged.

A chain thirty inches long was securely locked about their necks. A Mexican dagger, a two edged knife six inches long, was given to each of the duelists. The obliging cowboys then lowered the men into a dog canon a descent of seventy-five feet. There they were to remain until one killed the other, and no one was allowed to interfere further. The rest of the cowboys then went to work, as if nothing unusual had occurred.

For some days nothing was known as to the result of the encounter. Yesterday, however, Davis, very weak and emaciated, returned to camp, dragging after him the lifeless body of Jesus Garcia.

The story Mr. Davis tells is as follows: "The fight began as soon as we reached the bottom of the canon. Being locked together, each was always within reach of the other's knife. After such deliberation as the few moments during our descent permitted, I decided that unless the first blow were fatal, the chances were decidedly in favor of the party assailed. I accordingly allowed the Mexican to strike the first blow. He plunged his knife into my side. As soon as I found his arm thus stretched forward, I cut the muscles of his right arm near the shoulder. Immediately his knife dropped. While he was stooping to pick up his knife, I sent my blade into his body from the back. Before I could strike again he had picked up his knife and cut the cords of my arms, so as to render them both useless."

"Here we both stood for a few seconds, when I discovered that his heart had been reached. His body soon fell in the death struggle to the ground. The chain was so short that he brought me down with him. In a few minutes he was dead. I was so weak from loss of blood that I lay down by his side. We lay there for five days and nights, until hunger drove me to make a last effort. I climbed the steep incline of the walls of the canon and reached the camp, carrying Garcia on my back."—The Biggest Liar of them All, in New York Sun.

Apprehension of the Insane.

The first that I remember of my attack was while I was riding in a railroad car. It seemed to me that the passengers in the forward part were getting up amateur theatricals. The fact that this did not surprise me nor appear at all out of place, illustrates one curious feature of insanity, and that is its close similarity in many respects to dreaming. It is well known that the strange phantasmagoria attendant upon most of our dreams never strikes us at the time as at all astonishing, illogical or contradictory, because the critical faculty [illegible] so everything that occurs within the sight or hearing of an insane man affects him in like manner. Also, he has no more control over his words and actions, when the insanity is complete, than a somnambulist. And when a patient comes to himself, after having been insane he feels as though he had been having long, and, sometimes, a very unpleasant dream. Some of the delusions were of a frightful character, and resembled a nightmare more than anything else; but more often they were by no means disagreeable. Of course, it seemed strange to me afterward that I could have been carried away by such absurdities. At one time I thought that the end of the world had come, and that the day of judgment was at hand. This was somewhat remarkable; because I had not for years been a believer in the Spiritual prophecies relating to those two events. Nor had I any faith in the doctrine that there is a hell of fire; yet, in imagination, I visited that place of torment, and witnessed the tortures of the damned—without, however, getting scorched myself. Some strange conceits, that I had come across in books, occasionally suggested material for my mind to work on. I saw men whose souls I believed had been taken from their bodies, leaving behind the intelligent personal identity—an idea suggested by a character described in Bulwer's "Strange Story." Again, I thought that demons occasionally animated human bodies after death; and this fancy I must have got from a dramatic work by Bishop Coxe, entitled "Saul," in which the evil spirit sent to trouble that unfortunate monarch reanimated and took possession of the body of a priest whom Saul had slain. I mention these instances as serving to show the dream-like character of insanity.—From "Insanity by one who has been Insane, in Popular Science Monthly.

A War Pass From Lincoln.

It was dull at the St. Louis Cotton Exchange and when Mr. L. C. Norvell, the veteran story-teller of the Exchange, stretched out his legs leaned back in his chair and pulled a bit of pasteboard from his pocket, everybody drew near to listen. The pasteboard bore the inscription in a bold, round hand:

Pass Mr. Norvell from New York to Savannah, Ga.
December 29, 1864 A. LINCOLN.

"The children found that the other day rummaging around in an old trunk," said he. "I was in Washington in 1864, and I wanted to go to Savannah. I had a letter to Edwin M. Stanton which was warranted to get me the pass. I presented it to him. He read it and looked up at me.

"Well you can't go".

He didn't tell me to get out, but he looked it, and I left the office quick enough. I went outside and asked some one if I could see the president. I was told that I might try. I did try, and got in. He had one leg stretched over a chair.

"Well, sir, what can I do for you?" he asked.

"I told him I wanted to go to Savannah

"Then why didn't you see Stanton?," asked he.

"I've seen Stanton," said I.

"Well," said Mr. Lincoln.

"And he says I shan't go to Savannah," said I.

He laughed, and said it was like him. "Well, I don't think you would hurt us any if I let you go," and then wrote me that pass.

When I got to Savannah Sherman was there, and Stanton had come around to hold a conference with him. I saw Sherman, who said I would have to get right out, as they were having everybody arrested. I had some fine wine, brandy and whisky, and I made him a present of it, sending it up the next day. When I saw him again he reconsidered. Stanton was with him. He looked at me narrowly.

"What are you doing here?" he said finally as gruff as before.

"Attending to some business" said I.

"How did you get here?"

"Mr. Lincoln passed me."

"Humph," growled Stanton—"that's just like him. He tells me not to issue another single pass and then gives one himself to the first man who asks him."

City Folks in the Country.

From Peck's Milwaukee Sun.

Said the bad boy to the grocery man: "You see, one of the deacons in our church lives out on a farm, and all his folks were going away to spend the day, and he had to all the chores, so he invited pa and ma to come out to the farm and have a nice, quiet time, and they went.

There is nothing my pa likes better than to go out on the farm, and pretend he knows everything. When the farmer got pa and ma out there he set them to work, and ma shelled peas while pa went to dig potatoes for dinner. I think it was mean for the deacon to send pa out in the corn-field to dig potatoes, and after he had dug up a whole row of corn without finding any potatoes, he set the dog on pa, and treed him in an apple tree near the bee-hives, and then go and visit with ma and leave pa in the tree with the dog barking at him. Pa said he never knew how mean a deacon could be, until he had sat on a limb of that apple tree all the afternoon.

About time to do chores the farmer came and found pa, and called the dog off, and pa came down, and then the farmer played the meanest trick of all. He said city people didn't know how to milk cows, and pa said he wished he had as many dollars as he knew how to milk cows. He said his specialty was milking kicking cows, and the farmer gave pa a tin pail and a milking stool and let down the bars, and pointed out to pa the worst cow on the place.

Pa knew his reputaion was at stake, and he went up to the cow and punched it in the flank and said, "Hist, confound you." Well, the cow wasn't a histing cow, but a histing bull, and pa knew it was a bull as quick as he see it put down its head and beller, and pa dropped the pail and started for the bars, and the bull after pa.

I don't think it was right in ma to bet two shillings with the farmer that pa would get to the bars before the bull did, though she won the bet. Pa said he knew it was a bull just as soon as he got tangled up in his coat tail, and when he struck on the other side of the bars, and his nose hit the ash-barrel where they make lye for soap, pa said he saw more fire-works than we did at the Soldier's home. Pa wouldn't celebrate any more, and he came home, after thanking the farmer for his courtesies, but he wants me to borrow a gun and go out with him hunting. We are going to shoot a bull and a dog, and some bees, and may be we will shoot the farmer, if pa keeps on as mad as he is now. Well we won't have another 4th of July for a year.

A Valuable Relic.

Major G. W. Candee, Paymaster of the army, is the fortunate possessor of the first $5 greenback ever issued. It bears the date of March 11, 1863, and is marked "No. 1 of service of A," with the initials William H. Seward in the north-east corner. The Major came into possession of this valuable relic in 1876, the bill being discovered among the money sent on to pay General Custer's command the last time those poor fellows were permitted to feel [illegible] The Major has been offered several hundred dollars for the great treasure, but will not part with it for any amount. IN THE PARK.

Beneath a crown of blazing lights,
Like stars that pierce the gloomy dark,
All through the mellow summer nights
The lovers linger in the park.

Bathed in a ghostly silver glare,
The pavement shows with every breeze,
Sly shadows slipping quickly where
The leaves are kissing in the trees.

Two faces close, while lips repeat
That love each heart with joy receives—
A moment—then they softly meet,
And learn the lesson of the leaves.

DR. CARAJO'S PATIENT.

Dr. Carajo sat in his veranda, smoking a cigar. His chair was a curious bamboo structure, of Japanese manufacture; and upon the carved stone balustrade beside him stood a goblet of Venetian glass half full of iced sherbet. The doctor sat in the clear shadow, and gazed out meditatively upon a lovely prospect of semi-tropical sea and shore. His house, built in the Spanish style, stood on a height at the verge of the antique town—a town of narrow, irregular streets, and high-shouldered buildings, with projecting windows and arched doorways. It has not altered in hundreds of years, save to grow grayer, more indolent and more venerable. Here and there on the outskirts clusters of palm trees supported their dark, waving plumes on delicate stems; to the right a great river merged slumbering into the sea. Across this scene the afternoon sun flung a broad, mellow radiance, and breathings of delicious air came up with messages of coolness from the ocean.

In this lovely and forgotten spot Dr. Carajo had lived three years. Not every man could have made himself part of such a community without occasioning a good deal of excitement and remark; a stranger was nowhere so much a stranger as in that ancient town. But Dr. Carajo had ventured into the still and unmemorial life of the place as quietly and unremarkably as a shadow of the evening. Quiet and reserved he was of manner, but he was in no sense an insignificant man. His forehead was wide and high, with a peculiar fineness of modeling about the temples; thin black hair, slightly tinged with gray, grew in short curls about his head. His brows were heavy, his eyes deep-set and black, with a clear, calm gaze, which never kindled into wrath or melted into tenderness. His nose was straight, with sensitive nostrils; his mouth and chin were concealed by a heavy gray mustache and imperial. In figure he was slight, somewhat round-shouldered, and he had a grave, methodical way of walking, not devoid of unconscious dignity. In his bearing toward others he was courteous, but wholly cold and unimpassioned. His smile was rare and slightly contemptuous. His voice was musical and low, but somewhat metallic; his speech brief, unhurried and careful. He seemed not so much a man, with warm blood in his veins and living interests in his heart, as a serene and loveless abstraction of certain human qualities. Thus he came among the people of the old town unquestioned and, in a social sense, almost unobserved. He brought no wife with him, nor were there any female servants in his household. He never was known to seek a woman's company, nor to indicate by his demeanor any perception of difference in sex in those he met. On the other hand, as a man of learning, wealth and great skill in his profession, his reputation in the community was unrivaled, and people consulted him as they might have consulted some wise volume containing infallible remedies for bodily ills. Dr. Carajo, in brief, held the position of a kind of Providence, little thought about until he was needed, and then trusted implicitly. Professionally, he was known to every one; personally, to none.

II.

As Dr. Carajo sat smoking in his chair that sunny afternoon, the noise of a carriage proceeding up the street attracted his attention. Without altering his position he allowed his eye to rest upon the vehicle and its occupant. The latter was a woman dressed in white, with a black lace mantilla thrown over her shoulders. She was in the prime of her youth and beauty, but her anxious and nervous manner showed evidence of much distress of mind. As Dr. Carajo looked upon her his eyes dilated, his face flushed; then he grew very pale. He leaned back in his chair as if to conceal himself from view, and remained for several moments motionless, save for his uneven breathing, and the tremulous grasp of his hands upon the arms of his chair. But when the wheels stopped before his door, and the bell sounded in the court below, Dr. Carajo drew a longer and firmer breath, and sat erect. By the time the servant arrived with the information that a lady was below and desired to see him on a matter of life and death, he appeared no less serene and impassive than usual. "Bring hither a chair for the lady," he said, "and say that I await her."

Having given these directions, the doctor rose from his chair, and remained leaning negligently against the stone balustrade of the balcony, with his face toward the room which opened upon it. A short time elapsed—short, that is, by the watch, though how long it may have seemed to Dr. Carajo it is impossible to say. Then a rustle and a whiteness advancing through the darkness of the room announced the visitor's approach. As she set foot on the balcony the doctor bowed his head courteously.

"Dr. Carajo," she began, speaking abruptly and impetuously, "I was told to come to you—that no one but you could cure my husband—"

At that word the doctor raised his head and looked his visitor in the face, while a faint, contemptuous smile quivered for an instant beneath his gray moustache.

The lady stopped short, her beautiful lips apart, and her great eyes fixed in a gaze of seeming amazement or dismay. Presently she muttered some unintelligible words, raised her hands across her bosom with a gesture of fear or of repulsion, and her face and neck crimsoned with a hot blush.

The doctor contemplated her for a few moments, and then said coolly: "Be seated, madam. Your husband, you were about to say—?"

"I should not have come—they said Dr. Carajo—"

"You were rightly informed, madam. I am Dr. Carajo, and I alone can cure your husband—if he be curable. You may place every confidence in me."

"Oh, what shall I do!" murmured the lady, pressing her hands over her face. She stood dizzily, and would have fallen had not the doctor by a light touch guided her to a chair. She sank down, a tremor passed through her body, and her eyes closed.

"You appear yourself to be indisposed, madam," observed the doctor. "The heat outside is great, and you have over-exerted yourself. This scent will revive you," and as he spoke he held to her nostrils a small phial containing a pungent perfume. "You ask me what you should do," he continued. "You should, in my opinion, lose no time in telling me the circumstances to which I owe your visit. If your husband's case is so precarious as I am given to understand a delay might prove fatal."

"Would you not be more fatal than any delay?" demanded the lady, fixing her eyes upon him.

"You are scarcely complimentary," returned the doctor, with a smile. "I would do my best for him, as for any other human creature intrusted to my care. Nevertheless, if you deem it best to seek assistance elsewhere you should know me enough to know that I leave you free to do what you will."

"Yes, I know you in that speech," exclaimed the lady, in a low but passionate tone. "You would leave me free—too free. You say you would do your best for any human creature left to your care; but the human soul intrusted to your care you would leave free to fall into temptation and be destroyed! But perhaps God will be more merciful than you think."

"I will not say I am surprised at your attacking me, madam," said the doctor, quietly; "but I cannot pretend that, under the circumstances, I understand it."

A brief silence ensued; then the lady leaned forward, her hands clasped on her knees, and remained leaning negligently against the balustrade of the balcony.

"I am at your mercy," she said; "and even such a revenge as yours should be satisfied to see me here imploring your help. I take all the blame of what has been upon myself. But no punishment you could inflict on me could be half so humiliating as this which I inflict on myself. I ask you to save him! In asking it I give my life for his; for, after such a degradation, life would be a burden and a shame. If you have been waiting all these years for a chance to wreak your hatred on me, your time is come. It will never come again!"

The wild and reckless emphasis of this appeal, enhanced by the hushed voice in which it was spoken, seemed to have some effect upon Dr. Carajo. He stroked his gray mustache and meditated a little.

"Do you love this—husband of yours, Madam?" he finally inquired.

"Enough to beg his life at your hands," she answered, sinking on her knees.

"As a physician," continued Dr. Carajo, "I have my professional customs. While always ready to exercise my skill in behalf of human suffering, I demand in return certain equivalents. From some one thing, from some another, money but seldom, for I am wealthy; but I compel my patients to feel that when the cure is effected we are but quits. I have already told you that it will give me pleasure to attempt the relief of your husband; but I omitted to mention the equivalent. Are you prepared to give it?"

"Anything—even my life!"

"Not your life, by any means. I shall merely require you, as soon as he is restored to health, to leave this town, never to return. You will leave it alone, concealing from your husband your route and your destination. Never henceforth will you either see him or hold any manner of communication with him. Do you agree?"

The lady had risen to her feet, and was pressing one hand over her heart. Her eyes searched Dr. Carajo's countenance with terrible intensity. "Will you fulfill your part of the contract?" she demanded.

"I will," he replied.

Her bosom rose and fell rapidly, her face quivered, and was now pale, now red. At last she said, with a gasp, as if her words tore her life up by the roots: "Then I consent. God hear me, and judge between us!"

"Be it so," rejoined the doctor bravely. "And now, if you please, I will accompany you to your husband. On the way you will inform me as to his ailment. He shall be brought to my house, and you shall witness my treatment of him. Afterward——," he made a significant gesture. The lady moved her head in assent. But as they left the balcony a thought struck her, and she turned again.

"You will not let him know that you are—?"

"I will let him know that I am Dr. Carajo, Madam," said the other, bowing coldly and making way for her to pass.

III.

Dr. Carajo's private room was as cool, as quiet and as secluded as the doctor himself. The floor was of fine Pompeian mosaic, partly covered with rugs of delicately woven Indian matting. The lower part of the walls was of yellow marble, relieved with black; above were panels of rich woods, highly polished. The ceiling was vaulted, and contained a window of stained glass, in the nature of a skylight. At one end of the room was a deep alcove, across to which was suspended a screen or veil of some soft, silken fabric, through which the interior of the room could be seen, though the observer himself could be invisible. Large leaved plants stood here and there in marble vases; low plants and tables were placed in convenient positions; and in the center of the chamber was a broad couch or ottoman, cushioned, and draped with the finest cambric. At the end opposite the alcove was a small water-jet, playing with a tinkling through the mouth of a bronze lion's head into a marble basin attached to the wall. A delicious coolness and fragrance pervaded the apartment, which was entirely removed from all outside noises and influences.

Three persons were present in this room—Dr. Carajo, the lady, and a man who lay at full length upon the couch. He was tall and powerfully formed, with broad shoulders and massive limbs. His features expressed strength and vigor; too rugged to be called handsome, but full of masculine pith and ability. A thick brown beard covered the lower part of his face; his eyes were closed, and he lay in an apparent lethargy. Upon his forehead and on his arms, which were bare, appeared a number of small spots or blotches of a purplish hue. But for a slight intermittent movement of the chest, indicating a subdued respiration, the man might have been supposed to be dead.

"The opiate will exhaust its effects in a few minutes," observed Dr. Carajo, bending over his patient and eyeing him critically. "From this time the active phase of the case begins. The poison has thus far made itself perceptible only by a superficial heat and stinging. It will now lay hold on the interior parts of the organization; there will be little or no pain, but more danger."

"How long will this last?" asked the lady, who had now assumed a demeanor outwardly as quiet and self-possessed as the doctor's own. "We may expect three separate stages," the doctor answered, "extending over several hours. The patient will retain his faculties, but their action will be modified in a peculiar manner in each of the three stages. As the poison strikes more and more deeply inward you will notice a corresponding alteration in all he begins to awake."

"Is there any hope?" asked the lady.

"The poison is one of the most insidious and deadly known to science, and also one of the rarest," the doctor replied. "Probably few men besides myself know how to deal with it all. The strong vital power of the patient is in his favor; on the other hand, too, a long time elapsed before the treatment began. I have an antidote here which, had it been given immediately, would have overcome the evil."

"And how, should you give it now?" demanded the lady.

"It would still counteract the poison, but at the expense of the patient's life. He has not now the strength to undergo the necessary struggle."

"What shall you do?"

"I shall administer drugs which will have the double effect of increasing the vital power and weakening the action of the poison. Human skill can do no more. Hush! he will open his eyes in another moment. He must not be aware of your presence. Step into that alcove and make no sound. You can there see all that passes. Let nothing that he may say induce you to discover yourself unless I give you the sign."

The lady moved to the side of the couch, bent quickly and kissed the forehead of the half-unconscious man, and then drew back and vanished behind the curtain of the alcove.

IV.

The man drew a deep and quick breath, moved slightly on his cushions and opened his eyes. His glance wandered round the room, and passed over Dr. Carajo several times before seeming to take note of him. When at length it centered upon him, the man said, in a deep and resonant voice: "You are my physician, I suppose? I feel better—fresh from pain and more strength—thanks to your skill, no doubt. How soon do you promise to have me up again?"

"It is now 6 o'clock in the morning," said Dr. Carajo. "By this noon, at farthest, the crisis will have passed."

"The crisis! Humph! Then I'm not out of danger yet? Tell me the truth, doctor; I'm not afraid to hear it. Death or life—which is it?"

"Since you have chosen to ask, I will reply," said the doctor, after a pause. "You may live, but it is more probable that you will die."

"Humph! Well, such is life—and death. I have lived—I have been alive—as much as most men. And this is to be the end? The end; a strange idea that!" He was silent a moment or two, and then said: "Where is Lenore?"

A slight contraction overshadowed the doctor's brow and passed away again.

"I presume you refer to your wife?" he said.

"Certainly—the woman I love—my wife, if there's any meaning in words. Where is she?"

"It was indispensible, for her sake and your own, that she should remain apart from you for the present. She will be summoned as soon as safety will allow, or as soon as hope vanishes."

"Poor darling! What would become of her were I to go?" muttered the patient, half to himself. "I must tighten my grip for her sake. Not die! no—no! She gave herself to me, body and soul, and I must stand by her to the end. There, again—the end! Is this it? It isn't what I expected. Me to die, and she to live on? It mustn't be! my darling—my Lenore! What a life we have had these three years past? what a love! Never a day's shadow; never a regret. Ha! Doctor, you are there, aren't you?—and I've probably been thinking aloud, as my habit is. Well, I like your face; you're a cold man, but an honest one. You may hear whatever comes; and may be 'twould be as well to make you my father-confessor out and out! You're as honest as any jack-priest of 'em all—eh, doctor?"

"I have never betrayed the confidence of man or woman," said Dr. Carajo quietly.

"Humph! Well, I am myself indifferently honest as the world goes, but I can't speak quite so fair of myself as that. But 'tis society saps our principles. What law is so strong as the love of a man for a woman? And the strongest must win. Sin and virtue are a matter of words—be the responsibility his who utters them, and the suffering his who believes them. The wise man knows he is free, and that life is short, and the fire of youth burns but once. The treasure belongs to him who can keep it; vain to buy it with money or bind it with cords or vows. It will go where it belongs, and there it is safe."

"What, then, do you hold love to be?" inquired Dr. Carajo.

"I hold love to be all that my blood and marrow, my flesh and pulses, and my five senses tell me that it is—the delight of a man in what is strange, yet familiar; like, yet unlike; man, yet woman; forbidden, yet allowed. Love is passion—incarnate happiness; a surrender that is victory; to receive by giving; the generosity of selfishness; a fire that creates by consuming; a madness that is wisdom. It is the inarticulate language that transcends all languages—the sweet speech of flesh to flesh. There's a string of paradoxes for you, doctor, whereof you will comprehend nothing. Nor do I myself, for the matter of that; I only know that the look and touch of a certain woman will take a certain man captive, body and bones; and the more he is captive the better he likes it. That was my case. I found a treasure, made for me to enjoy; 'twas said another man owned it, but I knew naught of him. I have proved my right to it; and if it were to take over again I would take it!"

"Love, therefore, is wholly a physical matter?" said Dr. Carajo, with a smile.

"Yes; and yet by that inspiration man has invented poetry, and the soul and heaven, and all manner of the glorious hallucinations. Love cannot see, we say; no—nor will the sun ever cease to warm the cold, or water to refresh the thirsty. But neither the sun nor the water, nor love itself, will animate the dead; so what is one more than the other?"

"Surely a convincing argument," remarked Dr. Carajo, still smiling, and with a glance toward the curtained alcove. "And lovers parted on earth are parted forever. The only wonder is that for so slight a cause a man should compromise himself so deeply. The world is wider than a woman's arms; and power, learning and revenge are sweeter than her kiss."

"I have not found them so," replied the other, closing his eyes.

A long silence followed, during which Dr. Carajo's patient seemed to lie in a half-waking dream. The physician watched him carefully. At times he sprinkled his face with a certain volatile essence, fanning him the while with a long-handled fan of white owl's feathers; once or twice he made him swallow a powder of a reddish color. The fountain plashed in its marble basin, and the rainbow lights from the stained glass windows moved slowly along the walls and across the floor, and the flowers in their vases gave out their perfume. And all this time Dr. Carajo kept his face averted from the alcove, whence came no sound nor movement.

When at length the patient opened his eyes once, a change was manifested in his appearance. His pallor was great, so that a white gleam seemed to rest upon his face; his features were sharper; blue veins showed through the skin of his forehead, and his eyes were sunken and brilliant. His voice had lost its depth and strength, but was clearer and more penetrating than before. The expression of his countenance was composed and meditative.

"Where is Lenore?"

"Her time has not yet come," returned the doctor.

"My mind beholds her clearly," rejoined the other. "My thoughts dwell with her and commune with her own. In that sympathy of mind all love consists. Without it the blind passion of the heart and the senses are misleading and mischievous. They are the force, but intellect is the guide; and when their force is gone the intellect remains true to its choice. The delight of love is in the perception of its harmonies; and age, sickness or absence has no power to obscure it."

"Then, were you to see Lenore no more it would not disturb you?" asked the doctor.

"Bodily presence is not without its uses," answered the other, calmly. "To be a king you must have a subject, and the body is the subject of the mind. By steadily ruling it the mind realizes and confirms its aims and conclusions; and, on the other hand, the body, by its suggestions and limitations, sets the mind in motion, gives it strength. Without the body love would be a dream, as, without the mind, it would be but a sensual and promiscuous instinct. Nevertheless, love having once attained bodily incarnation, I conceive that henceforth the actual association together of the lovers is of secondary importance, though, perhaps, the mind needs to be refreshed occasionally by renewed intercourse with its mate, providing it with fresh incidents and developments to consider and interpret."

"Your philosophy is certainly persuasive," observed Dr. Carajo. "But from this point of view, what think you of the so-called sanctity of the marriage bond?"

"It is an ingenious device for the preservation of outward social order," said the other, "but not in itself worthy of an intelligent man's respect. The laws of the mind are evidently above the control of social laws. Were all men ruled, as they ought to be, by the intellect, bonds of any kind, marriage or other, would cease to be. Households would still exist, and families would be reared; but the free intercourse of mind with mind, with all that that implies, would be admitted, and, as a consequence, the passion of jealousy would vanish along with other relics of barbarism. In other words, marriage based upon intellectual sympathy would no longer be checked by marriages of merely material convenience, and immorality would disappear with the artificial morality which has created it."

"A desirable consummation, indeed," remarked Dr. Carajo. "And so you would, without repugnance, behold Lenore in possession of another of more sympathetic intellectual endowments than yourself?"

"The question seems a fair one," returned the other, doubtfully; "but I have, perhaps, omitted some essential point in my analysis. Allowing the possibility that such an intellect as you suppose might exist, I still can not conceive him as having rights over Lenore. The fact that we have belonged to each other has created between us something that did not exist before, and which cannot be removed; something neither physical nor intellectual, yet more substantial than either. I confess it perplexes me, and my mind is weary. I must rest awhile before considering it further."

And even as he spoke he sank into a lethargy.

V.

The interval between this stage and the final one lasted but a few minutes, but was marked by an even greater change in the aspect of the patient. The bodily substance of the man seemed, to a great measure, to have sunk away and become translucent, he was not so much a physical object as a spiritual presence. The light in his eyes had the appearance of proceeding from some source beyond matter, and to see things which material sight has no cognizance of. At times a slight trembling passed through him as if his body were shaken by the effort of some inward power to break away from its imprisonment. His voice, reduced to a whisper, nevertheless thrilled upon the ear with a distinctness and force that outdid the noisiness of the sturdiest lungs.

"Lenore!" he exclaimed, commandingly, "come to me."

"Hush!" said Dr. Carajo, with a frown. "She is not here."

"She is behind that veil," returned the other; "let her come forth."

At first there was no response to this summons; but by and by the curtain was grasped from within and slowly drawn aside. In the opening appeared the figure of Lenore, white in face and figure, like a ghost obeying a ghostly mandate. As her glance met that of Dr. Carajo's patient she faltered and uttered a low cry.

"You are dying, my love!" she said; "he has killed you!"

"By no means," said Dr. Carajo, sullenly. "At this moment I would buy his life with my own. Human skill has done its utmost."

"Do not come too near," murmured Lenore's lover, as she advanced toward him. "We have no time to lose."

"Am I not yours? Do you not love me?" she cried, in a voice weighted with unshed tears, and holding out her hands to him.

"There is a spiritual barrier between us," he said. "Do not by your fleshy hand disregard it. It seemed to me that I loved you; it seems still. But there has never been a true union between you and me. The license of the body, the arrogant insanity of the intellect—these parody love and banish it. Can happiness be founded on murder? And we murdered marriage, Lenore!"

"But I never loved him, nor he me," she said, passionately. And then with a sweeping gesture of the arm, she pointed to Dr. Carajo. "That is the man. Let him answer if what I say is not true."

The doctor shrugged his shoulders. "The question is a futile one," he said. "Sin, like God, is no respecter of persons. Take it, if you will, that I was justly served. Her responsibility toward the covenant she broke is the same, and thereby she is condemned. But I deprecate this discussion, and the foolish revelation which occasioned it. If I were the person she asserts, I have long ceased to be so. His name and his heart—be it good or evil—are mine no more. I am plain Dr. Carajo, a man of science and an observer."

"Your heart is at least the same in its coldness and revengefulness!" said Lenore, bitterly.

"Coldness! I loved you!" exclaimed Dr. Carajo, with sudden and strange vehemence. "I tried to win your love, but you withheld it. Mine was no surface passion, to be expressed with a flow of words and protestations; and because I could not speak you thought me indifferent. Then, in my absence, you met this man and betrayed me. I would not condescend to pursue you, and supplicate you, or to seek a vulgar vengeance. I left you to the retribution of time and change. And this hour rewards me."

"Can such love as yours be wrong?" demanded Lenore, turning to her lover. "Is it not his own justification?"

"No, Lenore; nor must we seek justification," answered the dying man. "We have polluted the sacred symbol which is the image of creation. As light is married to heat, form to substance and truth to goodness, so is man married to woman. The sanctity of that union is above and independent of individual conditions. For the sake of one selfish pleasure should we oppose and defy a law in which are bound up the purity and welfare of mankind? or should we say that because this man fails to be a worthy husband we may violate the warrant whereof he, whether worthy or not, is the representative?"

"If the love that for these three years past has been my life be wickedness," said Lenore, "then why should I desire truth and goodness?"

"The love which opposes love of humanity is, in its essence, not love, but hatred," the dying man answered. "It is with such love that we heretofore loved each other; it is grounded in mortality, and must pass away. But there is something in us that outlasts the strength of the body and the pride of intellect—a soul which cannot die, and whose love is real and immortal. My soul, which until now I have never known or acknowledged, is now awake and fills the place of death; it is I!"

"And do you love me still?" asked Lenore.

"Whether it be a new profanation or a promise, I love you still," he murmured; "nay, I have never truly loved you until this moment."

"We shall meet hereafter," she said.

"Let your heart imagine it," he replied; "the wages of sin is not immortal happiness. Pray only that he whom we have chiefly wronged be less a sufferer thereby than we ourselves."

"Let not that disturb you," said Dr. Carajo, gloomily. "If what this dying man has said be true—and it may be so, for aught I can tell—you have injured each other more fatally than you have injured me. I ask no more. Heaven may promise you what happiness it will; I shall not cross you there."

"Farewell, Lenore!" said her lover, in a tone whose solemnity overawed its tenderness.

"Must I stay here alone?" she cried out in agony. "Let me go with you!"

"Not so!" Rejoice, rather, that your road of retribution lies in the world. As for me, I go to a strange country, whose ways and boundaries no man knows."

There was a silence. He is gone!" muttered Dr. Carajo, turning away.

"But Lenore pressed her hand over her heart.

"He is here," said she.—Julian Hawthorne.

MY SUMMER GIRL.

My winter girl is clad in furs,
Wears skates like Turkish scimeters,
And many a witching wile is hers
When tinkle sleigh-bells.
But she is not the girl I take
To picnic grove or luscious "bake"—
To watch old Coney's breakers break,
And dine at Cable's.

My summer girl is muslin-decked,
Low-sleeved and often open-necked,
And I've no reason to suspect
She paints or powders—
For her complexion was the same
What time from Neptune's arms we came
And sweetly fed our mutual flame
On two clam chowders.

My summer girl, she sporteth, too,
A sunshade—buff, and lined with blue—
'Tis useful to obscure the view
When our two faces
Come into closer neighborhood
Than separate faces always should—
A thing at times misunderstood
In public places.

My summer girl can eat ice cream—
I wish you saw her! it doth seem
To vanish like a fleeting dream
When she commences.
Vanilla, strawberry, or pistache—
Or all at once—an ice cream hash—
I charge such items up to cash
In my expenses.

My summer girl is very fond
Of water-lilies from the pond—
In fact, I'd need a fairy's wand
To meet her wishes.
She likes cut roses, moonlight sails,
Fingerless mittens, long white veils—
That's the one point on which she fails—
She's too capricious.

Also she's rather glib of speech,
And talks away beyond my reach;
'Tis all in vain I try to teach
Her to be dumber.
I'll have to give her up, I fear;
But autumn, after all, is near,
And first-class girls are scarce and dear—
She'll last this summer.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Decorative Art in the Household.

In the Art Interchange, which is a household journal, may always be found admirable suggestions regarding the decoration of homes, and in the following paper from it are some good points:

The growing interest in applying the principles of art to the decoration of houses is an encouraging sign, and if women could be induced to overcome their natural liking for what has been well defined as "millinery" effects and for sham decoration, the houses of the country would speedily become marvels of good taste. As it is, harmonious arrangements of color in artistically designed wall and floor coverings and upholstery are to be met in connection with crude and tawdry attempts at ornamentation. For some reason there appears to exist a prejudice, on the part of women, against leaving any considerable portion of the wall space uncovered. It matters not how beautiful the wall paper may be, comparatively little of it is shown; every conceivable object, which is capable of being attached to a wall surface, from a tobacco pipe to a Japanese umbrella, is impressed into the service of decoration. No lithographic advertising plaque is too atrocious in design or coloring to prevent its being used in a beribboned state to disfigure house walls. Dressing tables, chairs, sofas and windows also tempt many women to the exhibition of false taste. Perhaps the most unpleasant manifestation of a liking for bad decoration is the increasing use of imitation stained glass. It has nothing to commend it; pretending to be what it is not condemns it to the category of shams, beside which it has no beauty of its own, either in color or design. A plain linen shade is not only more suitable, but infinitely more nearly artistic than the best of patent stained glass. As for walls, if a plainly painted or papered surface is for any reason undesirable, very beautiful wall hangings can be produced at comparatively little cost of time, by any woman who can wield a brush. Nothing more artistic can be conceived than these tapestry painted panels. They may be used with good effect to cover the entire wall surface, or only portions of it. The French, with their usual taste in art matters, have brought tapestry painting to a high degree of excellence, and England is also in advance of us in this regard. The art of painting upon glass is by no means impossible of attainment on the part of the amateur, and even if it were that would be no palliation of such an offense against good taste as the use of "patent" stained glass (paper). The simplest decoration on glass, even if it consists only of a tint, if well done, is a work of art and creditable to the worker. After several years of flower painting on small objects, such as plaques, panels, mirror frames and the like, there ought to be many hundreds of women among amateurs ready to undertake more serious work. To these are recommended tapestry painting and glass staining as pursuits useful not only for artistic decoration of the house, but as valuable accomplishments in a mercantile sense.

To an Amateur Artist.

First—In all illustrations for newspapers, periodicals, books, in all Christmas card designs, and tapestry patterns, bear in mind that originality and beauty of design are of first and greatest importance. Hence it follows that if you have sufficient artistic taste to draw anything worth your while you may use oils, water colors, pencils, crayons, charcoal, India ink, pen, or any material which suits your convenience. Yet, while you are permitted such liberty, it is best to select the material which you can most successfully manipulate, but let it be the best of its kind. If you should prefer oil as your medium, use the oil sketching paper or canvas; if water colors, water-color paper; for crayon sketches, stipple paper; for sketches in India ink, the ordinary French white paper; and for the pen, very smooth Bristol board. 2. Water color sketches are often very acceptable. Crayons are used by some of the very best artists of the country. They are peculiarly adaptable to landscapes, and nothing could be more beautiful than some of Gifford's crayon sketches of sea scenes. India ink is probably employed more than any other material. The design should be interpreted in wash without lines, the lines being put in afterward by the engraver. If you desire line interpretation, it is best to use pen and ink. Your design can then be photo-engraved by a new process in a very perfect manner. The catalogue of the Moss Engraving company, corner of Elm and Pearl streets, will give you many useful hints. 3. With reference to handbooks, we can recommend those published by F. W. Devoe & Co., corner of Fulton and William streets. They embrace all artistic subjects. Their new handbook, Water Color Painting, by H. W. Herrick, is especially beautiful and instructive. Among other advantages it possesses 135 hand-washed specimens of the colors in use, thus being a practical illustration of permanent and vanishing shades. This company can furnish you with the best artist materials of all kinds. 4. The Studio, 128 Broadway, a new publication, and the well-known Art Amateur, are good art journals. 5. Paintings, drawings, sketches, unless they are original and worthy to be ranked as works of art, or applicable as decorations, are not accepted by the Society of Decorative Art. Any article sent to the society is examined by the committee on admission, and nothing is accepted unless approved by this committee. Acceptance depends entirely on the merit of the composition. For any other information concerning this society, address Society of Decorative Art, 28 East Twenty-first street.

Baby Clothes.

Once upon a time, and not so very many years ago, loving fingers prepared the long slips and robes that constitute the first dress of an infant; but all this is changed. The fondest mother has now but to make out a list and spend a few hours in selecting the entire outfit, when her baby is furnished with dainty garments produced in quantities by professional workers, whose skill and taste attain results entirely satisfactory. In a word, good material and trimmings made up into pretty garments are for sale at prices so moderate that it is oftentimes a matter of economy to buy them. Babies, as of old, are confined to white dresses, made with high-necked yokes and long sleeves, and composed of English and French nainsook, Lonsdale cambrics and mulls. The simplest of the little day slips are made with yokes and trimmed with tucks, insertion and embroidery. Night slips are made shorter and narrower than are the day slips. These are usually fashioned without yokes. A favorite pattern consists of three box-plaits to the waist in front and one at the back. The garment known to the baby world as a robe is a much more elaborate affair than is the slip. The entire front of a robe usually presents one mass of embroideries and insertions, being finished about the bottom with a deep flounce of insertions, tucks and embroideries to match. Color is introduced into an infant's wardrobe in the dainty little wrappers, sacques and blankets provided, as well as in the trimmings of baby basket and crib. By the way, a whole chapter might be written in description of cribs and baskets, so elaborate have these articles grown within the past few years. Six months is the age conceded as the correct one for putting babies into short clothes, when comes a charming variety of styles and patterns. The English Mother Hubbard dress, with its tucked yoke and skirt, finished with tucks and deep embroidery, is a pleasing model, as are the little dresses shirred to the yoke and again at the knees, with and embroidered flounce below. The little colored dresses worn with white gamp waists, introduced last summer, will be largely worn by children one and two years old this season. Turkey red, light pink and delicate shades of blue and lemon are favorite colors for these dresses; the yokes and sleeves being of fine cambric, tucked and trimmed with lace or embroidery. To match come little sacks of the exact shade of the dress. Wraps are of fine cashmere, with fine embroidery, ladies' cloth or Gilbert flannel; the preferred colors being light pink and blue. There are also very dressy cloaks of surah, trimmed with Moresque lace. For summer pique will be a material much used. The Mother Hubbard continues a popular model. There is also a pretty style of loose sacque, a modification of the Mother Hubbard.

What a Girl Does.

The Modern Girl, to leave dancing out of the question, is still mother's orderly house to chaos by her æsthetic tastes and her decorating. She repaints the worn and japanned tea-waiters, and the water-pitchers, teacups, pie-plates, and her father's shaving-mug. She belongs to an amateur dramatic club and a reading Shakspearean association. She gets herself up as a bewitching gypsy or fairy for tableaux; takes singing lessons from a bogus "old master;" makes one of a French class where they villify each other in a foreign language in very bad grammar. She takes Turkish baths because her limbs are round, and it will be sure to get out if she goes down there to be sweated and rubbed and kneaded in an atmosphere that would parboil a Hottentot. She tells another girl who cannot afford it that she should die if she did not take them. She offers to play for everybody's benefit, and calculates on wearing a set of costumes that will paralyze the club. She takes swimming lessons at the Natatorium because she looks well in a close-fitting blue flannel shirt and drawers, and it is so nice to scream and have a big man rush in and drag her out, and girls who swim well are away above par at the seaside resorts. She joins the riding class because she sits her horse well, and is one of the few women who can wear a riding hat and look pretty. She encourages the Tally-ho parties, because it smacks of adventure to come swashing and rolling home recklessly in a road-wagon, under a tooting horn, and the suppers are delightful. She belongs to the Flower mission and visits the sick children and lonesome patients in the hospital, because it is the thing to do, and down in her heart she feels that her Creator demands something from her once in a while, and she enjoys doing a good action which makes her sleep better at night. She works like a slave at church festivals and dinners in a bewildering costume and a soubrette cap of white muslin, declaring every moment that she will "certainly drop;" but she keeps up surprisingly when more men come in with plenty of money and very little notion of how it all went when they go out. She looks on the female who comes in to eat as an infringement, because she did not bargain to swell her little feet up by trotting about with oyster patties and Charlotte Russes for other women.

Screens.

For a sitting-room fire screen, silk, satin, velvet or plush to match the prevailing color is appropriate. Crimson silk, vandyked at the bottom and edged by ivory-tinted lace, the stitch being run in a hem about six inches higher, over which, to prevent it looking too plain, may be worked a crest, monogram, or spray of flowers, in shades of gray and ivory, or else the paint brush may be brought into use. A miniature window frame may be added. A most economical style of decoration is a Venetian blind, which, with a fresh coat of paint will last many years, and may be opened and closed as desired. A large sheet of perforated zinc looks well worked in long stitches in bright-colored wool, and then filled in by a small bolt at the top. Screens to stand in the fender are very convenient. The large Japanese medallions look quite handsome when mounted on a wire or wooden frame, fitted into a weighted wooden stand, having gilt knobs screwed in for feet. The border round screen, made of velvet, stamped leather, or else a beading, such as is used for small picture frames, either of dark wood or gilt glued around; also a few gilt or wooden spikes at the top look well. A child's wooden hoop, with a delicate tint of pink or blue sateen, puckered fully on, and drawn together in the center, under a bunch of ribbon, is novel and easily made. A broad border of peacock's feathers, white duck's or pheasant's, round the edge, attaching a large handle at one side, of either twisted wire or cane, gives the appearance of a gigantic hand-screen. Three small hoops, when fastened at the back by a narrow slip of tin have an uncommon effect. There should be a prop at the back, like in a photograph frame, and each hoop may contain a picture or work; according to fancy. If a ture, it is better to cover the hoops by dark purple cardboard, leaving the prettily-shaped space for the picture at the back. A fire-place in a card-room looks well studded all over with large hearts, spades, clubs and diamonds, made on cards. These should be made large, about four inches long; red hearts, black spades, yellow diamonds, and dark green clubs.

Quarrels.

Women are companionable souls, and love to make other women witness their successes, and share or take all their troubles if possible. There never lived a girl who did not have some bosom friend and confidante to whom she told her secrets at night in bursts of enthusiasm, when putting up their crimps together and chewing gum, some responsive little noodle whom she openly ridiculed next day for the way she wore her panier or blackened her eyebrows. It is necessary that women should share their love letters with another woman and tell intrigues, otherwise the love of epistles and adventures are valueless. By and by a fracture occurs, a slight fissure such as suddenly gaps in a polished glacier of Mont Blanc, as a warning to tourists. Those two who have slept in each other's dimpled arms are all at once at dagger's points. No one so hated as either. And out come all the treasured little scandals and secrets in a voluble torrent, added to and swelled by all that imagination can produce as evidence. And the heads of the two families find it necessary to put more streets and townships between them. Yet with this bitter experience, leaving a bad taste in the mouth of each, both women hunt up another bosom friend in order that they may discourse on the vileness and perfidy of the lost friend. Public chroniclers might perish for news as to how women paint, powder, blacken their eyes, drink, smoke cigarettes, dine with other ladies' husbands, and cut up generally, if it were not for the "lost friends" who see to it that such doings do not go down to darkness and obscurity.

English Dressmaking.

One thing that is very odd about English ladies, says Lucy Hooper, is the fact that they never care to have their dresses fit. They all wear gowns, the cut of which would drive an average American female wild with misery. I was at the opera last night, and in front of me sat a young lady wearing a dress of pale blue brocade, trimmed with pearl passementerie. It laced up the back, and one side of the back of the corsage was fully half an inch higher than the other, to say nothing of such minor defects as sleeves cut out very much in the back, and a general series of wrinkles all over the corsage. This is rather an extreme case, but as a rule the dresses worn by English women do not make even a feeble pretense at fitting them.

The English dress and cloakmakers complain greatly at the fussiness and exactness of their American clients, who are used to well-fitting garments, and who insist upon having them when they pay a good price for the articles. The cases of the Messrs. Benjamin, the ulster-makers in Conduit street, may be remembered. They put a placard in the window saying that no orders from America would be received without prepayment of the half the price of the article. The reason of this was the simple fact that their American customers would not take ill-made, ill-fitting ulsters. They sent one, I remember, to an American lady which was three inches longer in front than it was at the back. So the lady refused to take it, and considerable unpleasantness was the result. Well dressed, one half of the young English women that one sees would be flesh-and-blood Venuses. As it is, they are merely the commonplace girls with a touch of the absurd about their appearance. Now and then one sees a face so fresh, so fair, so charming in its blooming youth and innocent candor, that it is loving in spite of combed-back hair and a horrible bonnet. But it must be very lovely to stand such a test, and not one in a thousand can do so.

A Good Waltzing Suit.

"Lisle thread is a somewhat new departure for underwear," says Clara Belle in the Cincinnati Enquirer, "and for persons of full habit, or those who feel the heat very much, there is nothing better. It is elastic, but at the same time offers a healthy friction.

"'I shall be able to waltz for hours this summer,' said a frivolous young thing, 'where last summer I could only keep it up for minutes.'"

"'How is that?' I asked.

"'You've heard of Spring-heel Jack! There was something or other about his shoes, if I remember rightly, that helped his gait so much as to make him a wonderful runner. Well, consider me mechanically improved all over in that kind of way. I've got on an elastic, eelskin sort of combination suit. It keeps me at a tension, and makes every nerve and muscle feel capable of unprecedented activity and endurance. A girl who couldn't waltz continuously under such conditions would be a rarity.'"

Night Gowns.

The prevailing styles for nightgowns are the sacque shapes with yokes of lace or embroidery. A novelty is a night robe of fine India linen, with a Watteau plait in the back, which has a demi train, the entire front of rich Florentine lace edging in cascades down the center and in a double quilting around the bottom. Linen lawn is much used with real lace for handsome gowns, made up with what are termed Pompadour yokes. The Mother Hubbard gown—a model borrowed from the children's dress of that name—is another style. On the more expensive robes there is a wealth of garniture, and the garment follows the outline of the figure closely, suggesting a dressing robe or wrapper rather than a nightgown.

Household Hints.

A nice way to cook a piece of the round of beef is to line a saucepan with thin slices of bacon; then lay the beef in. Cover it with water. Cover the saucepan, and let the meat cook slowly for several hours, or until it is perfectly tender. As the water boils away add more, so that plenty will be left for gravy. Season highly with salt, pepper, celery salt or curry, and some small onions sliced.

New potatoes cooked in this way make a dainty breakfast dish: Put a lump of butter in a frying pan, stir in with it as it softens a tablespoonful of flour, a small onion chopped fine, and a little parsley; lastly, a small cup of sweet cream. Stir until these are well mixed, then put in the cold boiled potatoes, cut in small pieces. Let all boil together. Serve hot.

So many of the small fruits, such as blackberries, plums, etc., are delicious pickled that a general rule for making a sweet pickle is desirable. To seven pounds of fruit allow two pounds of sugar, one quart of vinegar, and spices to your taste. Cassia buds make a very delicate flavor, but are somewhat expensive when compared with other spices.

An indigestible but delicious frosting for a cake of one layer is made of boiled frosting, with English walnut meats, raisins, and a very little citron added; chop these and stir in; have it about an inch think on the cake, and pin a paper around the cake so that the frosting will not run off before it has time to cool.

Mead, which is enjoyed by many as a summer drink, is made of one pound and a half of white sugar, with one pint and a half of boiling water poured over it; add an eighth of a pound of tartaric acid and half an ounce of sassafras. Bottle this, and when you use it, to each glass add a pinch of soda.

Tomato soup with beef stock instead of milk is very appetizing; to one quart of stock allow one pint and a half of stewed tomatoes which you have sweetened and salted to your taste; add an onion sliced, which may be removed before serving the soup. Let the soup simmer gently and not boil hard.

An excellent pudding is made of tart apples stewed, and then put in layers with fine cracker or bread crumbs. While the apples are still hot stir sugar and a little butter with them. This should be baked for half an hour. A little sweet cream is a great addition, but it is good without any sauce.

If your tomato vines hang very full of green tomatoes, a few may be picked and pickled, and those which are left will grow and ripen more rapidly. These green ones will make excellent pickles, and are nice canned for use next spring. They are so firm they will keep perfectly.

The linen duster is extinct as a traveler's cloak. Ladies now wear cloth, cashmere and summer silk dresses for traveling suits, with a tailor-made jacket or a Jersey polonaise that protects the dress from dust, and affords needed warmth.

One way to cook summer squash is to cut it in slices about an inch thick and boil in salted water, using just as little as will answer. When done drain it well and without mashing; serve it with butter, pepper and salt.

The late peas are sometimes thought to be improved if when cooking a small piece of ham, or bacon, or of corned beef is cooked with them. Remove the meat before serving, and thicken the soup with flour or arrowroot.

A little tomato catsup is a great addition to a mixture of cold boiled ham, mustard, etc., for sandwiches.

If nutmeg is grated and mixed with ginger in hard ginger-bread, a piquant flavor is given to it.

What Spoiled an Adirondack Romance.

Albany Journal: The story has already been told of the courtship and marriage of Emma Camp, the dusky daughter of Elijah Camp, the Indian guide of the Adirondack region, and Gabriel Mead, of Ossining, Westchester county. The bronze beauty of the Oneidas, who gave her untried affections to the pale face who came into the forest to woo her, is seventeen years old, pretty, vivacious and intelligent. She has caught the fancy for the nonce of many mighty hunters who broke bread with her father while pursuing the game of the endless woods to their lair. Her mother was a white woman living at Saratoga Springs. Both were in the village last Saturday. For what purpose the Saratoga Journal says: "The object of their visit here was in relation to some legal business, which was transacted for the Indian maiden by her counsel, Gen. Charles Hughes, of Sandy Hill. In December last the hand of the beauty was won by Mead, and they were duly and regularly married. He lived with her till May last, when the fickle youth abandoned his Oneida bride, and then commenced an action for a decree of nullity of the marriage contract, on the ground that he was under the influence of alcoholic stimulants when he was married to the blushing maiden of seventeen summers. It is understood that Mead's family and relatives, who are in affluent circumstances, disapproved of the marriage, and urged him to relieve himself of his Adirondack wife—the Indian girl must go. Gen. Charles S. Hughes had the place of trial of the suit changed to Saratoga county, and during the pendency of it he was appointed her guardian ad litem; and on Saturday, before Judge Bockes, at chambers, he was made her general guardian. We understand that Mead's friends have made offers to give Emma Mead, nee Camp, a cool $10,000 in hard and shining gold if she will not put in any defense to the suit, and thus allow him to have the marriage contract nullified. It is also understood that she has subsequently agreed to take the proffered amount, believing that $10,000 is preferable to a drunken pale-face husband. Mead need not have been ashamed of his attractive bride, who is a young woman of fine presence, and is very highly spoken of by those who are acquainted with her. Though Indian blood courses through her veins, Emma is as fair as the average white person, and has a fine presence. Her mother, a former resident of this place, is also a woman of excellent appearance."

Pansy Blossoms.

A Chicago Tribune reporter who happened to be on Michigan avenue without his waterproof when the rain began the other day, took shelter in a music store. It was not one of the swell music stores with a six-inch-deep carpet on the floor, and a brass-buttoned attendant at the entrance, and a clerical-looking usher inside, and a dozen smirking clerks behind the counters, and a pretty young lady on the cashier's stool—it wasn't that kind of a store. It was a plain store, where space was valuable. One-half of it was a tailor's shop and the other half was music—music in wagon-loads. There were at least 10,000 "Only-a-Pansy-Blossoms back of the window, and 5,000 Old-Oaken-Buckets" on the end of the counter, and a wheelbarrowful of I'll-Meet-Her-When-the-Sun-Goes-Downs" in the middle of the floor, and a big pile of Maiden's-Prayers in the corner, and an armful of Peek-a-Boos hiding behind the chair, and about a million of Over-the-Garden-Walls and Biddy-Magees and Cackle-Cackle-Cackles stowed away under the tailor's cutting-board. There wasn't room to whip a cat, as the saying is. "I believe you want some street agents to sell music, don't you?" said the reporter. "Yes, sir?" said the man in charge, looking the reporter over as though he was afraid of him stealing something. "I believe I could make some money at that until the telegraph strike is over; I don't want to be idle," said the reporter. "Yes, I am sure you could, if you are willing to go into it," said the young man. "We have a couple of men at it, and they earn over $6 a day easily. There is no trouble selling new songs; you see the music is just as well printed as the 50-cent issues. The wholesale price is 2 cents a copy. Suppose you take 100 copies to start with—that will give you a nice assortment, ten songs and ten copies of each—costing $2. You soon sell them off, if you are any good as a salesman, and that's $3 earned. It depends a good deal on the songs you offer whether you succeed. Now, here is a beautiful thing that everybody wants," and the young man reached for a sample piece and began to sing the air:

And it's how I love,
Pretty little Mary,
She's the keeper of a dairy:
Oh how I love,
And I'll meet her when the sun goes down.

The reporter stood the racket with perfect complaisance—he has a boarding-house chum who is learning the concertina, so he is fit to stand any kind of amateur harmony. "Very nice, indeed!" he said, with mild enthusiasm. "Now here's another," continued the young man; "it's Gus Williams' song, One of the Finest,' and it sells like hot cakes. You wouldn't believe what we sell of that song. Here's Is That Mishter Reilly? and it's a whacker. We Never Speak as We Pass By has an immense sale also, and Empty is the Cradle is another of the O. K.'s. Here's a tip-topper, Baby's Got a Tooth, and again the music began:

George dear, George dear, would you know the truth;
George dear, the baby dear, bless the little youth
Do get up and light the fire,
Turn the gas a little higher,
Run and call my Aunt Mariar,
Baby's got a tooth!

"Could I sell some for you in the stores?" asked the reporter when his applause had subsided.

"Yes, you could, I'm sure. We shall let you sell it at 2 cents a copy, and give you 25 per cent commission on sales. Terms cash. I think you could do better that way. Now here's a piece there's thousands sold of (singing):

"Only a pan——"

It was too much—the reporter wildly fled.

The Plug Operator in Trouble.

Chicago News: "I think a good deal of my success in life is due to the fact that it has always been my policy to take things as they come. But when things quit coming, what's a fellow going to do? Now, things are beginning to quit coming in the Western Union operating room. Night before last cigars quit coming, and last night my order for ice cream was dishonored. I didn't miss the cigars the first night, for, having dined rather heavily in the evening, I had no desire to smoke. I find that I have been dining too heavily of late, anyhow, and the rich food I've been eating is making boils come out on my neck.

When I called the check boy last night, and ordered him to bring me a few mild cigars out of the chief operator's box, a sickly smile came over his face, and there was that in his eye which sent a Manitoba wave up my spinal column.

"There ain't agoin' to be no more cigars for you fellers," said this Ishmaelite; "cigars is played out."

"No more cigars?" I ejaculated.

"'Nixy,' sneered the human hyena; 'nixy. I guess you fellers 'll have to tackle fivers again. Tubbs ses the 15 cent cigars make you nervis, so you can't work the key. Tubbs ses it's for your own good not to smoke cigars what cost more 'n a nickel. Tubbs ses ham operators work better wen dey smoke stin——'

"'Look here,' said I in a commanding voice, 'I do not care to smoke. Bring some ice cream and cake.'

"'Tubbs and Clowry,' answered the Williams street imp, 'ses ice cream is bad for de pancratic glanz, or sumting, and ham operators always feel better wen dey bies it demselves.'

"'What do Tubbs and Clowry know about my pancreatic gland?' I said, scornfully. 'This is a terrible let down. Does Felton know what's going on?'

"Yes, I should holler," said the snickering mocker, "Felton ses he wood as live feed lobster salad to de stuffed whale as ice cream to a plug operator. He ses it's throwin' perls afore swine. Felton told Clowry dat he oughter bi a bar'l ov tobacco stems and a few dozzin clay pipes, instead of feedin' you fellers on 15 cent cigars as 'ell give yer de janders. Felton ses of yer want ter make a ham operator feel contented feed 'em on section-house hash, let 'em chaw stumps an' smoke painted cabbage leaves, an' den put him to bed in a hay loft. Felton ses——"

"I know the boy invented a good deal of this, but he must have heard some of it. Is this what we get for coming to the rescue? Is this our reward for standing by the corporation when it was submerged in trouble? What business is it of mine if the restaurant bill for July was $5,000? What did the chief operator show it to be for?

"Isn't it enough that I had to plank down my nickle when I rode home to-night? The company is still furnishing the grub. Let them cut off the victuals and I will join the brotherhood. I am with the brotherhood even now at heart. Let even a roast potato be missing to-morrow and I will march out of the office to assert and maintain and fight for the rights of labor. [N. B.—I'm pretty well fixed for cigars; I have got my clothes out of hock; I'm solid with my boarding house, and I know a fellow I can hold up for the drinks for a month."—The Plug Operator.

Descendants of Martin Luther.

Chicago News: Luther left three sons, and it has often been said that their male line was extinguished early in the last century. But the report is confirmed that there are at Cloister Allendorff, on the Werr, in Meiningen, two brothers, Heinrich and Carl Luther, who can prove descent from the great reformer by a genealogical tree, which has been deposited for safety with a Leipsic insurance company. Heinrich, the elder, is a journeyman carpenter, while Carl is studying theology. Their mother is said to have been the daughter of a high official at Berlin. Their father was working at his trade as a mason in the capital, when the girl fell madly in love with him, as much through enthusiastic admiration of all that related to Martin Luther as from appreciation of the good-looking young journeyman. But the marriage ended unhappily, for the mason's wife was disinherited by her family, and is said to have died in misery.

VANITY OF VANITIES.

Though in my verse I leave no monument
More lasting than the sepulchres of kings;
Although my song-birds fold their failing wings,
And my star tumbles from the firmament;
Although I may not cheat the discontent
Of Time, who, heedless how a lover sings,
Closes his hand about his throat and clings
Close and clings hard until his life is spent,
I shall not heed if in the hours that run
To dust between my hands, one hour of thee
Flamed like a jewel; so when hot desire
Has tossed away and pleasant youth is done,
A gracious memory may abide with me,
Dreaming of love beside a dying fire.

The Postal Reduction.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Aug. 21.—The more important of the monthly questions now being asked as to the impending reduction in the rate of letter postage are answered in a circular on the subject which the postoffice department is sending to postmasters. The following are the more important paragraphs of this circular:

All postmasters are instructed to limit their requisitions for 3-cent stamps and stamped envelopes to quantities that may be deemed sufficient to last until the 1st of October. Postmasters will take all available means, without incurring any expense to the department, of calling public attention to the reduction of postage, so that purchasers may not accumulate an unnecessary supply of 3-cent stamps or stamped envelopes. No arrangements have yet been made for the redemption of 3-cent stamps and envelopes in the hands of postmasters, or for the exchange of such stamps and envelopes in the hands of private holders. Until further notice, therefore, postmasters will not make exchanges for the public, nor will they return to the department the stocks remaining in their own hands on and after the 1st of October. The 2 and 3 cent stamps and stamped envelopes of the present designs will continue to be valid after the 1st of October. The 3-cent stamps may be used in combination with other stamps. The department will be ready to issue 2-cent adhesive stamps on the 15th of September, and stamped envelopes on Sept. 1, in order to be placed for use on the 1st of October. The new 2-cent stamps and stamped envelopes must not be placed on sale by postmasters or used before the 1st day of October, 1883. Special request envelopes of the new design must not be used prior to that date.

The court then instructed the jury to acquit, which was done, and the beer saloon and garden keepers are happy.

A JERSEY SNAKE HUNT.

Practical Use of an Imitation Mouse At Close Quarters.

After the road came to an end altogether and left the wagon jolting over an unbroken field, the old horse put on a remarkable burst of speed and turned into a narrow lane leading to a small farm-house.

"Look here," I said, "didn't I pay you to carry me to Jerry Martin's?"

"Sartin you did, sir."

"Then why don't you do it? Why do you stop here at your own home?"

"Done the best I could, sir. This is Jerry Martin's place, sir."

"And you?"

"I'm Jerry Martin, sir; at your service sir."

A quarter so neatly earned surely was well deserved, and, checking an impulse to say something sarcastic, I laughed and told Jerry my errand.

"Snake huntin', is it?" he exclaimed, in something like astonishment. "Want to go snake huntin'? Well, I never! Fine gents from the city never hunts snakes, as I knows, on. Goin' to start a circus? Museum business, maybe No? Well, I never. Jest want to hunt snakes! Maria!" he shouted, in a voice that might have been mistaken for a steam whistle.

A nervous-looking little woman stepped out from behind a chicken coop.

"Ye needn't yell so, Jerry Martin; I ain't deaf."

"Here's a gentleman from the city as wants to go snake huntin'," Jerry moved back to note the effect of his words. Not a muscle moved in the careworn face under the sun-bonnet.

"Well" she said, a moment afterward, "why don't you take him?"

"I'll do it—for a half dollar."

In a few minutes Jerry and I were again jolting over the unbroken field in the direction of a forest of scrub pines.

"Snakes is scarce around these parts this year. Fire over to Hammonton way drove 'em off last summer. The big 'uns took to the pine swamp 'bout quarter of a mile below the clearin' in the piney woods over to the right of us, and the little ones was burned up. It's harder for me to git snakes now, but when I finds one he's sure to be a whopper an' big enough to send to a circus. The little ones I send to saloons an' restaurants for show windows. Billy Howe, in Camden, he used to sell 'em for me' but he's gone out of the business, and I have to ketch 'em and sell 'em myself. I was up to the Zoo-oligical Garden in the city last week to see about selling a big piney snake, but Mr. Brown, the superintendent, was away, an' the duffer at the gate wouldn't let me in. I ain't seen the big snake for three weeks, an' if he ain't pulled up stakes an' gone on a vacation he's hiding in the swamp. Can't stand the hot sun, d'ye see, and only comes out for any length of time on cloudy days. Not much chance for 'em to-day."

At the edge of the woods the horse was unroped from the wagon and turned loose. A covered basket, a pronged stick, a bottle of chloroform and a small sponge were taken from a box in the wagon. In the basket was an imitation mouse, fastened to the end of a stout stick, and wound around to the end of the stick was a small ball of twine. An old cloth apron completed what Jerry called the "outfit."

Down to the edge of the big swamp, where the weeds and the bushes grew thick and high, Jerry walked softly and after five minutes of slow creeping, sat down upon a log.

"Keep quiet, now," he cautioned, "there's lots of snake-holes around here. Here's where I saw the big 'un three weeks ago. Now, you hold the end of the string while I fasten the mouse in the clear spot over there."

The stick upon which the imitation mouse was fastened was forced into the ground so that the mouse rested in an upright position about an inch above the sand. The string reached from the mouse to the log. We lay down, side by side, behind the log, with our heads upraised so that we could command a view of a semicircle thirty or forty feet in diameter.

We waited five minutes in utter silence Then Jerry's arm moved backward quickly and the string fluttered an instant in the sand.

Squeak! The imitation mouse cried out as if caught in a trap. A bird stopped chirping overhead. Squeak—squeak! The bird flew away. At irregular intervals for ten minutes the mouse shrieked in anguish, but only the flitting shadow of the swaying string disturbed the dull gray surface of the sand. Through an opening in the trees the sun blazed down in sullen fury. Out in a clear field the heat throbbed upward like waves from a furnace, The narrow horizon beyond the trees waved like a banner, and the branches of the bushes hung motionless in the stifling air.

Squeak—squeak—squeak! The mouse was becoming furious. Over at the base of a stump something moved. A streak of yellow-gray sand seemed to start into life. Jerry nudged me softly.

"A snake." It was but a whisper, but the snake heard it and stopped, with head upraised and tongue darting back and forth like the flame of a spirit lamp. The mouse became frantic at its danger. Jerry seized the crotched stick, the cholroform, and the sponge and was making ready for a spring, when I saw by a sudden pallor in his face that something had happened. I leaned toward him and he put his lips close to my ear.

"There's a snake crawling over my legs," he whispered. "Don't move a muscle!"

Jerry bowed his head upon the log and became as marble. In a moment something touched my legs twice. A chill ran through me; my veins ceased throbbing and my lungs refused to do their work. The snake was feeling his way across me. A second lengthened into a minute, the minute to an hour, seemingly, and still the snake dragged his heavy length across my legs. In that second of horror and disgust the reptile was as long as a ship's cable and as heavy as a tree. When I felt myself free of the weight I turned my head. Jerry had risen, and with stick in hand was stepping over me. He made a lunge at something, and when I jumped to my feet I found him holding the stick upon the snake's neck.

"Wet the sponge with cholorform, quick, and hold it down upon his nose."

While I was doing this the snake wound himself about the stick and about Jerry's leg twice, but in a moment the folds relaxed and the snake was as limp as a rope.

"That's the way I ketch 'em," said Jerry, as he wrapped the snake in the apron and crowded it into the basket. "No trouble about that, is there? Tomorrow that piney snake will stretch his six feet o' length in a box that I've got up to the house, an' next week he'll go to New York or to the new museum on Arch Street, Philadelphia. That mouse does the business every time. That first snake skipped back into his hole when the mouse stopped squeakin'. No use tryin' for 'im to-day any more. Wouldn't come out for a drove of mice. They're mighty sharp, snakes is."—Letter to Philadelphia Times.

ROCHESTER IN RUINS.

A Fearful Tuesday Evening which Sees the Minnesota Town a Victim of Cyclonic Wrath.

Hundreds of Buildings Shattered, 26 People Killed and 80 Other Unfortunates Injured.

Nearly all Public Buildings Damaged and a Loss of $300,000 Inflicted.

RUINED ROCHESTER.

HORRIBLE WORK OF THE CYCLONE.

ROCHESTER, Special Telegram, Aug. 22.—The citizens of Rochester are wan of cheek and hollow-eyed, and well they may, since they passed last evening as evil a quarter of an hour as ever fell to the experience of man, and to this succeeded a night of horror, such as made men used to the terrors of a stricken field wince and shudder. The storm first came at 7 in the evening and lasted from twelve to fifteen minutes. Not until after 6 o'clock were the residents the least alarmed, which is the strangest, when it is remembered that a month ago cyclonic fury vented itself but a few miles from here. By 7:10 the southwest quarter had assumed that sickly greenish tint which serves as a drop curtain for such dire work. In a few moments the green changed to copper, then to bronze, with whitish edges and latteral lines of flying scud athwart it in every direction. Next was noted that dreaded and dreadful inverted cone, with height seemingly immeasureable and murkiness appalling. With the speed of a cannon ball it came down the valley of insignificant Silver creek, and when within half a mile of the devoted city, its roar could be heard. Cellars were rushed to by almost every one, but a few of the hardier ones stayed at points of vantage near the edges and witnessed

THE ATTACK OF THE RESISTLESS MONSTER.

Full 300 feet in the air it rose, and in its whirling mass were trees and stones, animals and debris of every conceivable description. The dome of the court house melted from view, though touched merely by the hem of the wind. Trees snapped like cat-o'-nine tails, or stranger still, were twisted as corkscrews in the hands of a Titan, and lifted bodily into the air with tons of earth clinging to their roots. Animals were dashed against stone walls, and their backs and bones crushed to powder. The roar of the fierce surge was like nothing ever heard before. The atmosphere was surcharged with electricity, and pellets of rain and hail were driven vertically as if shot from a rifle. Fifteen minutes of this terror, and then a silence. By 8 o'clock the stars were shining as peacefully as if cyclones were unknown; but the silence was soon broken by the groans of the dead, dying and the sorely wounded. The northern part of the city, fortunately not the larger or thickly settled portion, had been changed from a habitable place to maze of mangled matter, a desert with signs of woe and terror scattered everywhere. Not a house stood where 300 had been at 7 o'clock. Most of the dwellings were of the poorer class but many were pretty, carefully tended and decorated houses. The citizens on the South side quickly repaired in crowds to the scene of direst disaster and went to work. All night long by the fitful light of lantern at first and later aided by the moon they toiled.

SCORES OF BODIES

mangled, cut, torn and bruised, some breathing, some breathless, were taken out. By sunrise those of the dead or wounded who had friends were speedily borne to private houses. The majority were taken to Rommel's hall, a large building on Broadway, where cots were hastily prepared for the wounded. The dead were taken away by friends or to W. H. Seward's undertaking place on Broadway. Physicians and nurses were soon to the fore, and everything possible done to alleviate suffering. The wounded were in a horrible plight, and a walk through the hall where they lie, even now, makes one faint. The cuts and bruises are generally about the upper part of the body, and childish faces are seen with wounds on them so ghastly that even the physician shudders as he uses sponge and needle. Into the cuts dirt and even powdered stone were forced in many instances. Cellars seemed of little or no protection, since, while some of the houses above them blew away, those to the west were crushed bodily into their depths. Think of two mothers, as late as noon to-day,

SEEKING FRANTICALLY FOR LOST CHILDREN,

seeing three who corresponded in size with those they sought, but all so marred by dirt and blood and wounds that even maternal love could not tell whether to say "mine" or not. The scenes around the demolished houses were heartrending; men, women and children crying bitterly and almost bereft of reason. An absolute doubt exists in many cases as to where the site of their home was; ever a dreadful uncertainty and a haunting dread, and through it all the breeze sighing gently, the moon smiling calmly and men working bravely. The rising sun showed the utterness of the desolation. Queer freaks there were, of course. Here stands a wall, and on it hangs an unbroken looking-glass, while a heavy stove, crushed into fragments, lies on the floor near by. There, swaying to and fro in the breeze, is the family rocking chair, while a few feet from its horse lies

MANGLED AND DEAD.

A feather bed yonder twisted like a rope, and touching its edge a student's lamp, with even the chimney intact. Down near the river stands the large Cole mill, with a cyclonic bite taken from its western end. To the south of it is a train of eight loaded cars turned and twisted as if of straw, while in the race at the northern side are two more cars blown bodily from the track and into the water. The owner of the mill was lifted fifty feet vertically and hurled against a bank and killed. Not a bone in his body was left unbroken. Rochester, as every one knows, was a beautiful city, and as much on account of its trees as anything. A score of years will not restore its pristine loveliness in this direction. Some of the streets in the best part of the city are impassable, and looking up or down them one sees nothing but a tangled mass of trunks and foliage jammed across the roadway. Scarcely a residence—Mr. Van Dusen's is about the only one—that has not suffered more or less: and in many cases heavy chimneys were crushed through the roofs and garrets into the floors below. But description is utterly unable to portray the results of a storm which, in the worst of its path, absolutely leaving nothing of grass or tree, or shrub. The relief committee is doing all possible, and residents are subscribing all they can, but help is needed, and speedily. Rochester gave liberally to relieve those who suffered in the July cyclone, and now feels justified in calling for aid to meet the horrors and alleviate the sufferings consequent on the worst calamity Minnesota has ever known, confined in the same space. Superintendent Sanborn, of the Winona & St. Peter, is here, and is doing all possible to repair damages. Passengers transferred around the ruins of the bridge over the Zumbro and the Horton elevator, which lies bodily across the track. The telegraphic facilities are very poor. Not a pole in or near the town was standing this morning, and hundreds of messages are sent in for transmission to absent friends. In addition to already sent are the following; The family of A. Van Frank are all seriously though not fatally hurt. The following have had barns and houses leveled to the ground:

SWEPT PART OF THE EARTH AWAY,

Henry Chapman; house of Charles Egenton, former proprietor of the Hotel St. Louis; L. Derby, Frank Bey, W. E. Chamberlin (the latter had seven head of cattle killed and the horns blown from twenty-one others; tough, but true; Christian Oleson, whose wife is fatally hurt, mother-in-law killed and little daughter shockingly cut; Gunder Panlson, Ole Murida, A. Masenbruck.

THE DAMAGES IN ROCHESTER.

THE INJURED.

The following is a list of the injured as far as known, but is necessarily very incomplete:

John Rudt, wife and child; George Hansen; S. A. Welch, shoulder sprained; Charles Quick and four children, one fatally; Dr. Weatherbee, dying; Mrs. Osborne and little girl; —— Haggerty, head hurt; Dr. R. Williams; John Schenrock, badly cut; Mike Sweeney; Oscar Hawkins; Mrs. Irwin and three children, two badly; Nelse Hansen, wife and child, latter badly; three children names unknown; Edward Coon, leg broken.

BEFORE THE CYCLONE.

The weather throughout the day had been unsettled but not unusually threatening. Clouds would form and disappear, forming again heavier than before. The wind was mostly from the southeast, blowing scud clouds with it, while away above the rain-bearing stratum drove from the northwest all day. About 3 o'clock a black cloud rose in the west, very threatening, but it passed harmlessly by with a furious wind and some drops of rain. At 5 a low black bank lay in the southwest. It rose rapidly, but presented only the appearance of an ordinary thunder shower. As it neared the city it began to assume a horrible appearance. The whole sky was tinged a ghastly green, and the masses of clouds swept around here and there in gigantic circles. Wherever it was possible people took to their cellars, and in no case where that was done was life lost. In the upper part of the city the darkness was at no time great; but at the lower part of town it grew dark as night,

FILLING EVERYONE WITH TERROR.

Then came the awful roar so well known as the precursor of a cyclone, and the storm burst upon the doomed city. Houses were as straws in the grasp of this terrible power and no tree, of whatever size, in the track of the storm withstood its fury. The whirling, swaying funnel left the broken country west of the city and struck the farm of Mrs. Fatroute, lying two miles south, where the timber, buildings and grain, both standing, shocked and stacked, were wholly destroyed. Thence it moved down the valley of the Cascade toward the northeast, with a track about a mile wide. The dwelling of Mathew Engel, a large two-story frame building, was raised in the air and dashed back a shapeless mass of ruins. His barn, a new, large substantial one, shared the same fate. The house and outbuildings on the farm of John R. Cook were

CRUSHED PERFECTLY FLAT.

The family of the tenant, Mr. Ecker, was in the cellar and escaped. On Mr. Ainslie's place, just north of here, all was laid flat but the house, which was partly unroofed. On Dr. Eaton's farm, the family took refuge in the stone basement of the barn and barely escaped with their lives. The condition of things in the northern part of the city defies description. A few splintered stumps and scattered boards remain to show where the Third ward was. The buildings in this part of the city were mostly one-story frame houses. Many of them without cellars, and there was the greatest destruction of life. The mill and dwelling of L. Tondre are a total ruin, while the immense Zumbro plaining mill, John M. Cole, proprietor, is badly wrecked, huge pieces of the building being torn out and carried off.

MR. COLE'S FATE.

Mr. Cole, who was in the mill when the cyclone reached it, thinking his house a safer place, started for it, but had not gone twenty feet before he was caught up by the wind, carried a distance of eight or ten rods and dashed to the earth a mangled corpse. The residences south of the railroad to Zumbro street all suffered, losing roofs, windows and chimneys. The shaded residence streets are almost impassable from broken trees, pieces of roofs and debris of all sorts. On Broadway the tin roofs are off from Zumbro street north, and much of the plate glass is shattered. The First ward suffered the least, many dwellings escaping without any injury whatever.

OTHER TOWNS WIPED OUT.

Reports from outlying towns are coming in slowly, and show that the damage is not confined to this city. Pleasant Grove is reported annihilated, two persons being killed and ten wounded. The town of Salem lay in the track of the cyclone southwest of here, and is said to be wiped out. The top story of the court house is badly wrecked. The cupola was carried several rods, and the building left exposed to the weather. The tower of the school house lies on the ground, and the roof is damaged. The roof of the Methodist church was blown away, and the walls are half crumbled down. The steeple of the Congregational church knocked several holes in the roof in its fall. A children's picnic just retured from the country had taken refuge in the school, but all escaped badly scared. Had some of the children been at home they must almost certainly been killed. A fine new building belonging to George Stocking and occupied by him as a grocery lies a total wreck. A. D. Vedder's farm machinery warehouse is completely demolished and the machinery scattered. The railway depot is unroofed and badly riddled. The roof of G. W. Van Dusen & Co.'s elevator was carried away, and the warehouse adjoining crushed. H. T. Horton's and the warehouse and offices of Whitten & Judd are a mass of ruins. The Rochester harvester works are completely pulverized, not two feet of the wall remaining standing. All of the machinery is a total loss. The railway bridge is gone. Superintendent Sanborn is here with a force of men, and railway communication will soon be secured. A thousand people are homeless and dependent upon the charity of others for shelter and the necessaries of life. The resources and sympathies of the citizens are taxed to the utmost, and help is badly needed from abroad. An impromptu hospital has been made in Rommel's hall, and about forty sufferers are being cared for by a volunteer corps of nurses. The damage in the city cannot be less than half a million and in the surrounding country an estimate is impossible. Fences are all gone, cattle injured and at large, stacks of grain and hay have totally disappeared and crops of corn and potatoes are beaten flat.

ELEVATOR LIES ACROSS THE RAILWAY TRACK,

IN DODGE COUNTY.

In the townships of Westfield, Ashland and Canistee there were five deaths—Mrs. Helmbrech, Mrs. Christian Olsen and infant, an old lady, mother of Mrs. Ole Mulda, and one man, name not learned. Young Mrs. Mulda is fatally hurt, as is Andrus Fredericksen. Joseph Thornyton, north of St. Charles, Winona county, was killed, and his wife and other inmates of the house injured. In Pleasant Grove, ten miles south of Rochester, at 4 o'clock, three hours earlier than the big storm, a cyclone struck several houses, killed two persons and wounded ten. The storm, so far as can be learned, started in Westfield township, near the west line of Dodge county. It continued through Dodge and Olmsted and into Winona counties, a distance of about sixty miles, and varied from two and a half to three-quarters of a mile in width, being the widest where it started. In the path of the storm nothing worth saving except the acreage is left. In Rochester the damage to the principal buildings is:

Court house unroofed; main tower and part of roof off.

High school and Methodist church, walls down, roof and spire gone.

Insane asylum, part of roof on east wing gone; not badly damaged, and the patients all right.

Spire of the Congregational church gone.

George Stocking's and A. D. Vedder's brick blocks ruined.

Every elevator more or less hurt.

Horton's elevator lifted bodily and thrown across the railroad track.

Cole's mill destroyed.

Rochester Harvester works, total wreck.

Depot unroofed.

W. C. Rich, Judge Start, and C. H. Chadbourne say a conservative estimate of the loss in the city alone is $300,000. The city has 500 homeless people to care for, and traces of the July cyclone are still plenty. Help is needed, and at once.

SOUTH OF THE RAILWAY.

The following business buildings south of the railway were simply unroofed and slightly injured:

Cook's hotel, Stebbins & Co., Horton's Opera House block, Ozmeer & Booth, W. H. Seward, J. A. Cole's mill, Rommel's block, T. P. Hall & Co., Mrs. P. Graff, Broadway home.

But few dwelling houses north of the track were badly damaged, but a great many barns and fences have disappeared. All kinds of stock are running at large through the country, more or less bruised and crippled, and almost unrecognizable on account of the coating of mud and filth. The barn of R. B. Hall blew across the railway track about two miles west of here. The hired man, sent out to signal a train, not understanding the railway code, gave a false signal, and the train was badly wrecked. The fireman was instantly killed and horribly mangled and three or more passengers and train men severely injured. The resources of charity in this city were severely taxed by the cyclone a month since, and without outside aid it will be impossible to prevent an immense amount of suffering and destitution. Rochester extend an urgent appeal to her sister cities of Minnesota for aid in this, her time of trouble.

The Ruined City.

Rochester, the county seat of Olmsted county, is a city of about 6,000 inhabitants. It was one of the handsomest cities of the many of which Minnesota can boast. It is laid out regularly, with broad streets, shaded by numerous trees, with the Zumbrota river wending its way through the city from north to south, with a fine public park in the center of the city. Rochester contains many handsome public buildings, among which are the State hospital for the insane, the Olmsted county court house, the High school, the Cook House, and other hotels. The city has been noted for its many beautiful residences, with large and well-kept grounds, betokening the wealth and taste of their owners. The State fair was for several years held at that point, the extensive grounds being located in the suburbs of the city. The Southern Minnesota Fair association had taken possession of the buildings and grounds, on the removal of the State fair to Owatonna, and elaborate preparations were making for an exhibition this fall, which promised to rival the State exhibition. The grounds were large and well provided with all the necessary buildings, with a fine race track. Rochester was incorporated as a city in 1858. The first religious organization was the Methodist, which established a church in 1856. An Episcopal society was organized in 1860, and a Presbyterian society in 1861. Each have fine churches, ranging in cost from $4,000 to $9,000. Besides these there are fine Catholic, Lutheran and Universalist churches which are an ornament to the city. The high school building was erected a few years ago at a cost of $75,000. The county buildings, which occupy one of the finest locations in the city, cost $40,000. There are two weekly newspapers, the Rochester Record and the Rochester Post. In 1867 the Winona & St. Peter railway was completed to Rochester, which has now become one of the great primary wheat markets of the Northwest. There are in the city five large flouring mills, an iron foundry, woolen mill and carriage factory. Rochester has been visited by severe storms in former years, lying within the now apparently well defined track of atmospherical disturbances, which crosses the southern portion of Minnesota from West to East, but the present is the first occasion when serious damage was obtained.

THE TRAIN ACCIDENT EXAGGERATED.

The story about the train between Rochester and Zumbrota was exaggerated. The wind blew the switch open and the train ran off about half a mile west of town, turning over the whole train and killing William Higgins, fireman, of Dodge Center.

RELIEF MEASURES.

The promptness with which the call by Gov. Hubbard for aid at Rochester was met by contributions is a splendid indication for Minnesota. St. Paul starting off by raising $1,000 a minute for the first five minutes after learning of the news, Stillwater giving $1,000, Red Wing $500 and other cities according to their abilities and public spirit, shows that the prosperity of the State has not spoiled her people.

THE FIGURES.

The principal losses in Rochester, as nearly as have been estimated, are as follows:

Court house, unroofed	$2,000
High school building, tower and part of roof gone	2,000
Methodist church, roof gone, sides bulged, wrecked	6,000
Congregational church, steeple off	1,000
Railroad depot unroofed, round house gone, bridge ruined and other losses	15,000
Vandusen & Co.'s elevator	10,000
H. T. Horton's elevator	7,000
Harvester works and machinery	12,000
J. M. Cole's mill, side and roof off, mill wrecked and engine blown into the river	30,000
Crescent creamery	9,000
Cascade mill	5,000
George Stockbridge's store and stock	3,000
Wain Beardsley's building	1,000
A. D. Vedder, machine depot	2,000
Ten business blocks unroofed	5,000
Two hundred and fifty houses with contents	185,000
Two hundred and sixty houses damaged	20,000
Total	$304,000

The Situation at Rochester.

ROCHESTER, Special Telegram, Aug. 27.—The wrecked city is begun to recover from a bewilderment, and to move in earnest to save what remains. A few houses in the track of the cyclone that were wrecked and not carried away, have been straightened, and will afford shelter against coming storms. A heavy shower passed this morning, soaking hay and grain that had not been protected. More rain is threatened to-day, and the work of replacing tin roofs and shingles is being crowded to the utmost. The rain this morning penetrated the hospital, and made the position of the watchers and injured very disagreeable. The roof will be put to rights before any more rain falls. The condition of the sufferers is much better than before, except in the desperate cases. Mrs. McMasters died Saturday night, and was buried Sabbath afternoon. Mr. D. Weatherbee died Monday noon. His children, who are made orphans by the storm, were with him to the last. The children that were bruised and mangled beyond recognition are in a fair way to recover. The relief committee is busy distributing the gifts of clothing and food sent to their headquarters, but thus far the supply is far from sufficient. Volunteer sewing circles are busy throughout the city, making up clothing to supply temporarily those who have nothing left. The building committee met this afternoon and will decide on some plan for providing homes for the thousand at present houseless and dependent on others for shelter. Mr. G. W. Van Dusen and Hon. R. A. Jones leave for Chicago to-day to solicit aid from the board of trade. They will also visit Milwaukee. Firms in New York city and elsewhere are being heard from with generous contributions. The sympathy of the country is thoroughly appreciated by our citizens. The city was crowded on Sunday with sightseers. But one opinion was universally expressed as to the effects of the storm, that the desolation was much greater than one could possibly imagine without seeing it. Services were held at the Baptist, Episcopal and Presbyterian churches, the only ones left fit to occupy, and were of a most impressive nature. At the Baptist church the pew of John M. Cole was heavily draped in black.

MAYOR WHITTEN'S APPEAL.

Mayor Whitten of Rochester has issued the following circular letter:

ROCHESTER, Minn., Aug. 24, 1883.—On the evening of Aug. 21 a terrific cyclone struck our city, completely destroying 135 dwellings and totally demolishing their contents. A large number of others were unroofed and otherwise damaged. In the city, nineteen persons were killed (this is strictly accurate) and about 100 wounded, several of them fatally. The ruined houses were nearly all owned and occupied by mechanics and laborers, who have lost everything they had in the world except the clothing upon their persons and the naked lots. In many cases the heads of families are injured. The cyclone entered the county at its western border, and in its course destroyed the crops and buildings on about forty farms. Others lying contiguous were damaged, and five persons were killed outside the city. The relief committee has a detailed list of 124 families, in the city alone, entirely destitute. We appeal to the public for aid. The leading business men of the city are all heavy losers, and cannot, therefore, do as much for the sufferers as they would wish. They have, however, contributed liberally. None of the public buildings have escaped damage. One school building is destroyed, the court house is unroofed, the churches are seriously injured, one of them—the Methodist—demolished; the elevators and warehouses are all wholly or partially in ruins. Provisions are plentiful. Money, clothing and carpenters are needed. One hundred thousand dollars expended in tools, lumber, etc., for the penniless would scarcely put them on their feet sufficiently to enable them to help themselves. All contributions are placed in the hands of a thoroughly organized committee of twenty-one citizens, and may be forwarded to the undersigned.

S. WHITTEN, Mayor.

Gen. Sherman's Kissing.

Washington Letter to the Cincinnati Commercial.

General Sherman is fond of kissing young ladies. He says he fell into the habit when quite young. He cannot resist the temptation to salute a pair of rosy lips. The time or place makes no difference with him. If the general had devoted half the time he has spent in kissing young ladies on the babies he would probably have been president long ago.

An incident occurred a day or two ago that illustrates the general's fearless nature. A bright-eyed brunette had just alighted with her mother from a carriage in front of the Ebbitt House. The street was filled with people as well as the hotel lobby. The hero of the march to the sea appeared in the entrance. "Why, my dear, how do you do?" and the white-haired veteran rushed forward and caught the young woman around the waist and before she could help herself kissed her two or three times fairly on her lips. The young lady blushed as red as a peony. She did not object to the kissing, but the publicity was too much. Disengaging herself from the general's arms she said, with a pretty pout of her lips: "General, how dare you take such a liberty with me!"

"Tut, tut, child," was the reply, "I am old enough to be your father; yes, even your grandfather!" Young men who have attempted to imitate General Sherman in kissing every pretty girl they meet have met with disastrous results. The general's white hairs seem to give him immunity. He once said 'When I come to die I shall ask to have a bevy of young ladies gather around my bed and kiss me to death. In parting from earth I wish to have a taste of heaven".

Thirty Million Feet Lumber Burned.

At Williamsport, Pa., on the evening of the 26th., a fire quickly destroyed the saw mill of Finley, Young & Co. The flames spreading northward destroyed the office of the firm of Merriman & Sons, then entered the lumber yards and burned over a square, destroying a large quantity of lumber and piles. It is estimated that from 25,000,000 to 30,000,000 feet of lumber was burned. The total loss is expected to reach $500,000. The principal losers are Finley, Young & Co., Merriman & Sons, Payne Cochrane & Co., Kramerman & Co., and Edgar Munon. The amount of lumber lost by each cannot yet be told. All are insured in every company represented in the city. Among the losers L. Schneider's loss is $75,000.

Nearly every engineer on the New York and New England railroad has a sweetheart or wife in New Britain, Conn. Every train would whistle a salute to some fair dame, and the din grew so fearfully ear-splitting that the authorities have had it stopped.

The average temperature in the City of Mexico throughout the year is sixty-five degrees, and during the hottest months of the year, April and May, the temperature seldom exceeds eighty-five degrees.

The POLK COUNTY JOURNAL claims that Paul Sletten, assisted by Knute Nelson, is entitled to the credit of securing the re-opening of the thirteen townships for settlement. In the same issue it says, Knute Nelson returned from his claim in the thirteen townships the first of the week and reports having secured the boss pine lands. Comment is unnecessary.—[Detroit Record.

Yes, we admit that we did say all of that and suppose the Record fool thinks that he has struck a mare's nest now for SURE! (Having failed in all his venomous lies against Sletten and Nelson he now finds them handling pine lands (?)) But, alas for his little theory the Hon. Knute Nelson, who so ably aided Paul Sletten to open the withdrawn lands don't happen to be the Knute Nelson who has secured a quarter section of pine lands in the thirteen townships. That individual, while his name happens to be Knute Nelson, don't happen to be our Congressman at all—only a commissioner of Polk County. Yes, Mr. Hamilton, "comment is unnecessary" except to such fools as you who do not seem to know that there may be two men by the same name, or else, who knowing it well enough are little and mean enough to try to use it to the disadvantage of a good and true man. You wi[illegible] have to try it again, Hammy!

The Aitkin Age still retains the name of R. L. Frazee in place of Chas. A. Gilman, for Lieut. Governor, and seems to imagine that because a few men down there in the woods approve of it that Gilman is tee-totally busted. Why bless your unsophisticated heart, Barrett, Aitkin County ain't the whole State by a good many acres and, outside of Aitkin County, we presume you can't find a corporal's guard who feels that way or even ever heard of such a man as R. L. Frazee Charley Gilman will be re-elected by a large majority and don't you proceed to dis-remember it.

The Record man has struck another bonanza—a regular Kilbourn lead. Last year it was frantically "showing up" how the Hon. Knute Nelson jumped the Kilbourn claim and now it has another terrible stunner on Knute ("don't mention it!) PINE LANDS!! Well, the Kilbourn case was, the same as this is—nothing in it and the Record lies flat on its back, as usual kicking and howling itself blue in the face over such a terrible fraudulent fraud as the Hon. Knute Nelson. Mean time that gentleman continues to live and to move and to have his being all the same.

"Twenty Bushels" and Other Things.

We see a great deal in the newspapers about 25, 30 and 35 bushels of wheat but we should not be beguiled by that into the belief that the average for the county will be 25 or even 20 bushels per acre. While it is the fact that some pieces will go as high as 25 and possibly 30 bushels per acre it is also the fact that many will not go half of that; in fact it is only the land that has been thoroughly worked and carefully prepared that will yield above 20 bushels per acre. The habit of looking at samples of wheat, from an exceptionally good field, that is estimated to yield 25 bushels per acre and from that to make a great blow and parade, claiming that the whole county is going to average 20 bushels per acre, while it may be a harmless amusement may be subject to serious objections. If the newspaper reporters are unanimous upon that point, and every farmer helps it on by showing up his very best grain and studiously concealing the cloven foot, (i. e. the 3 or 4 bushel grain) is it not reasonable for grain buyers to reason among themselves something like this? "Well, here is this Red River Valley crop; all of our reports go to show a yield of 20 bushels on an average; 20 times the number of acres in crop figures 'way up into the millions; with that amount of wheat in sight we can't afford to pay more than 65 cents per bushel." We do not say that these large yields (before the threshing machine tells its story) has anything to do with it but we, all of us who have been in the valley for several years, know well enough that this sort of thing has been done every year and we know, that with one or two exceptions, the prices have ruled away down at first and remained so until the fact became apparent that there was not such an overwhelming avalanche of wheat in the valley after all. Another point of objection we note is that if a farmer is a little disposed to be dilatory in giving his fields as thorough cultivation as it should have to produce its best results, might he not listen to this syren song of "25 and 30 bushels, with an average of 20 bushels sure," and thus be beguiled into neglecting to do his plowing properly in the fall? His plowing is, (or should be) nearly finished before the threshing machine tells him that he has only 10 or 11 bushels per acre—too late to look out for the next crop. The object of this article may appear to be faultfinding but it is everything but that. It is simply to call attention to facts just as they exist and, perhaps, to suggest a remedy for the writer hereof has been a resident of this Red River Valley for eleven years, has seen much wheat raised and has raised a little of it himself and believes as much in the natural fertility and capability of our soil as the most rabid, blatant enthusiast in the valley but he just as firmly believes that Nature has not done it all by any means. Our land is capable of producing from five to ten more bushels per acre than it does if it is treated properly. We saw, in a paper a few days since, (and a paper that claims to know everything but in reality knows nothing about our soil and how to treat it) something like the following advice. "Farmers ought to plow deep. They should plow as deep as they can with an ordinary plow and then follow in the same furrow with a subsoil plow and poke that down as far as they can!" The writer's idea seemed to be that the nearer China a man gets the better the soil. But that is all folly and there is such a thing as going too deep and thus defeating the object—a good crop. There is no danger, however of a man's plowing too deep with an ordinary plow and the object he should keep in view should be a proper depth and a thorough cultivation. This cannot be secured if the land to be worked is too wet, as a great deal of our land is. You might plow such land down to China (if you could) and not raise a kernel more to the acre. The first thing to be done to that land is draining, then, with thorough cultivation you will raise those big crops that you read about. In the first place your land must be in the right condition, then thoroughly plowed, summer fallowed and thoroughly dragged, thoroughly seeded then thoroughly rolled—you can't pack that soil too much after your seed is in, and by the way this little item of seeding is one of the fine arts that is too little understood for so important an item. If you sow too thick your grain can't stool well, if too thin, weeds will grow rank to the obvious detriment of the grain, and the farmer must be his own judge as to the requirements of his soil and the season. Farming is one of the arts and sciences which needs as much study and brain work as any other. If it is properly applied our soil will yield far greater returns than it ever has. Statistics have never shown 20 bushels of wheat per acre on an average for this valley but they would if farmers would awaken to the fact that eternal vigilance is the price of wheat!

Excursion to Devils Lake.

Grand Forks Herald:—Arrangements were perfected yesterday for the first annual excursion and basket picnic of Maxwell Division, No. 75, Order of Railway Conductors, to Devils Lake, Fort Totten and other points of interests around the lake. The excursion will leave Grand Forks at 7 o'clock, Thursday morning, September 6th, and return the same night. The Cadet band are engaged for the occasion and a jolly time may be confidently expected. As the railroad-boys never do anything by halves, the event will undoubtedly be the finest affair of the kind that has ever taken place in the Red River valley.

Grand Forks Herald:—A specimen of Dakota corn was left at the Herald office yesterday, that was raised on the farm of J. Baldwin, of this city. It measured nine feet and four inches in height, and plentifully supplied with ears well ripened. A glance at the above specimen will be enough to convince the most skeptical that corn can be successfully raised in North Dakota, although the season for corn is short, when compared to localities farther south, the unrivalled fertility of the soil effectually counteracts that drawback. It is safe to say that the day is not far distant when the corn crop of North Dakota will prove a powerful rival to No. 1 hard.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Times.

Childs, Sterrett & Hill will commence work on their new elevator Monday morning.

Some parties broke through the window in Morgan's grocery store last Sunday night, and helped themselves to two sacks of flour and a lot of other goods. Sugar and canned goods were stolen. The parties who stole the goods will have plenty to eat for some time to come, and if they are found out, will get free board and lodging at Stillwater.

We were out in the town of Sanders last Wednesday, eight miles from here, helping Mr P. F. Pursell one of the traveling men of the Walter A. Wood machine company, set up a self-binder. The crops are excellent there very heavy and well filled, we think they will average from twenty to twenty-five bushels per acre. The market for the wheat of that town is St. Hilaire, and there is lots of it too.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

East Grand Forks needs a jail, and will commence the erection of one during the next ten days. Quite a number of turbulent characters, who manage to get full of alcohol in Grand Forks, imagine that just as soon as they cross into Minnesota they are safe, and can commit any depredation they feel disposed to. But our officers have been instructed to show no quarter, and we are pleased to note that the good work of thinning out these ruffians has commenced in dead earnest.

Robert Coulter, of Mallory has received word from Jones & Hewitt. Agents for the Canton (Ohio) Bridge Company, that work will be commenced on the iron bridge to be built across the river at Mallory, on the 15th of September. The bridge will be a single iron truss, costing $6,000. Mr. Coulter and six other citizens of Mallory gave bonds in the sum of $2,000 that the citizens of Mallory would build the approaches. The bridge will be finished on the 10th of October. Too much credit can not be given Mr. Coulter for the interest he has manifested in this matter.

Yesterday morning the trial of three of the vicious looking villains who are charged with breaking into the post-office, was had before Justice Higdem, E. F. Masterson appearing for the state. The main witness was Reilly, the man claiming to be a detective. Reilly is a pretty tough looking customer, and whenever he was called on for dates of the events which he was testifying to his memory invariably failed him. Another fault of his is, that when he is testifying against a criminal, and wishes to clinch his testimony beyond all doubt, he invariably calls on the prisoner whom he is testifying against to substantiate what he has testified to. Two of the prisoners, John Gleason and Thos. Ryan, were bound over to the district court in the sum of $500 each, and not being able to procure bail, Sheriff Zwickey escorted them to the county jail. The trial of the remaining two will be concluded to-day. When the train arrived from Crookston yesterday six more tramps attempted to land, but concluded, after getting a sight of the deputy sheriff to continue on their journey.

Winnipeg is "passing under the rod." Auction sales, sheriff sales, forced sales, sales of bankrupt's stocks. sale on "retirement from business" are the order of the day—and night. Nightly there are at least half a dozen auction sales progressing, while everywhere can be seen the "flag of distress" announcing clearances below cost. This is the end of an inflation, and not near as good as a quiet, steady growth. There is no doubt but that city is destined to have a great population in the future, if the lesson of last year is heeded.—[Ex.

Conductor's Excursion.

Grand Forks Plaindealer:—Maxwell Division, No. 75, Order of Railway Conductors have completed arrangements for a grand excursion to Devils Lake, Fort Totten and other points on the great inland sea of Dakota. The excursion will take place on the 6th of September. The conductors have worked hard to make the excursion a success and they should receive substantial encouragement. All who go are assured of a splendid time. The Grand Forks Cadet band have been secured for the occasion and bills will soon be issued announcing full programme.

The Polk County Crops.

Grand Forks, Aug. 27th 1883.

We are pleased to inform the readers of the plaindealer that the farmers in Polk county, in the Red River Valley, are cutting a crop of wheat and oats that will surpass anything cut in that section for the past five years, both in quantity and quality, and much if not all is due to a system of drainage adopted by the farmers last year, and now as this benefit is thoroughly demonstrated it is hoped they will continue with their good work.—[Herald.

American Dairy:—Barley straw is the best of all straws for feeding cattle. It is even better than some low grades of hay, and when cut up and wet with ground feed it helps to give the cow's coat a glossy, rich appearance. The only objection to it is that the beards of the grain are liable to get in the cow's eyes—we never, however, knew anything but temporary inconvenience to come from this.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, AUG. 30

LOCAL NEWS.

Charlie Seely has a novelty in the shape of a clock which runs but no fellah can tell how it runs. Drop in and see it.

Frank V. Lytle threshed his barley one day last week and had some of it ground up with oats for feed.

C. C. Utzinger held a grand reception all day on Saturday at his new hall on Second Street. The hall is elegantly fitted up and looks as neat as a new top.

Johnson Bros., & Wing have broken up their establishment in this city and taken their goods to Grand Forks. They carried an extensive and elegant line of crockery.

Bro. Hoskins, the Bathgate Sentinel man, was in the city the latter part of last week enjoying the evidences of civilization. He reports business reasonably lively in Bathgate.

Mr. C. B. Palmer dedicated his new office on Friday evening of last week by opening a keg of nails for the boys. A goodly crowd attended the opening ceremonies and did ample justice to Mr. Palmer's generosity.

Mr. Wm. Kistenmacher and his wife returned from their trip to Germany last week. Kistenmacher looks as fresh and blooming as a rose. The trip evidently did him lots of good.

The sharpest thunder and lightning storm of the season visited us on Sunday evening, accompanied by high wind. This vicinity has been extremely fortunate in this particular this year having had but very few severe storms.

The Ada Index says that Anthony Scheie has just returned from a visit to the old country. He has been absent since last April and has traveled through Denmark, Norway and Sweden during his absence.

A little six-year-old boy, son of Job Dougherty, fell from a reaper, on Saturday last and broke his right fore-arm badly. Dr. Van Dyke set the broken member and the lad is doing as well as could be expected.

Dan McKinnon has put in a lunch counter in order to be prepared for the hungry multitude that will throng our streets during the great fair. Dan knows how to entertain in prime style and always does it.

The Northwestern Cornet Band was out on Saturday evening serenading our citizens. The JOURNAL was favered with some fine music. The band is improving and will soon be able to scare up as fine music as can be manufactured in the State.

Mr. Earnest Mœckel, who was at Ada last week informs the JOURNAL that a farmer named Wm. Eickoff, was severely injured by a runaway team attached to a reaper, on Wednesday. The man was seriously injured so much that his recovery is a matter of doubt.

The Grader Company are talking of sending men into Illinois to work up business there pending our harvest in the Valley. They have done a good business here and have benefited the Valley thousands of dollars worth. They will be on hand for the fall and spring trade.

Ira DeCamp, who has been traveling north and south in the interest of the big Polk County Fair says that on the Grandin farm he saw 135 self-binders at work cutting down the golden grain and that farmers everywhere were busy as bees in the good work. He says that this week will see the larger majority of the grain of the valley in the shock and much of it in the stack.

The Kittson County Enterprise, with its issue of Aug. 25th enters its second year. The Enterprise is a neatly printed eight column folio, ably edited by W. F. Wallace. Whatever there is at Hallock to support such a large paper as the Enterprise we fail to discover, (unless it is the "Enterprise" of its citizens,) but the fact remains that the paper is a good one and seems to have a good support.

A drive north this week showed harvesting well commenced. John Wyand had 20 or 50 acres of No. 1 hard wheat in the shock, and Dept. Sheriff A. N. Hopkins had made a big hole in his splendid wheat on section 8. With good weather the wheat in Polk County will be nearly all in the shock by fair time and the threshing machine will be pounding out the No. 1 Hard wheat at a lively rate.

Mr. John Grey, whose illness we mentioned last week, died on Friday last. He came to this city with his brother, Lester, in 1878, and was one of the carpenters who helped to build the JOURNAL office. He was a young man, about 25 years of age, who had made many friends in the home of his adoption, as was attested by the large number who attended the funeral ceremonies on Sunday. He leaves a brother and sister in this vicinity to mourn his early death.

The Coming Fair.

Elsewhere we publish a communication from Mr. John Knuppe, in which he offers to take and take care of such samples of grain, or vegetables as may be left with him for exhibition at the coming county fair. The managers desire a brief statement to accompany the exhibit stating when sowed, when cut and how cultivated; whether on breaking, backset or not, old ground whether summer-fallowed or not and such other items of interest as farmers desire to know. It is to be hoped that every farmer in the county can come with their families and enjoy a holiday but if any are doubtful, this provision that Mr. Knuppe has made will permit all to have an exhibit there thus all will be able to contribute in showing what the grand old county can do. If you have any doubt as to your ability to be present remember Mr. Knuppe's kind offer and select some vegetables and cereals for the great fair that now bids fair to be well attended by hundreds of strangers who will, by such an exhibition as the county is able to make, receive the right impression of us. It will be one of the best advertisements the county ever had at very small expense. We have assurances that there will be a large attendance from outside and we trust that a large display will be made.

Larimore Pioneer:—In Mr. McGraw's field a self-binder was left standing Saturday night in the edge of a piece of oats. The wind started up the machine and propelled it along till it had cut and bound two bundles and dropped them off. Wont some inventor catch an idea here?

Closed for Repairs.

"Got a conundrum for you Johnnie! invented it myself," said a boy to a playmate. "What's the difference of a poodle you're dragging by a chain and a rotten tree-trunk?" After due deliberation Johnnie passed. "One is a led dog and the other a dead log. Them kind is awful easy when you know how." So thought Johnnie, and on his way home he built one on a similar plan, which he tried to explode on the maternal head. "I say, ma, here's a riddle; made it myself. "What's the difference between the wax figger of a lady and pa not letting me go to the circus last week? 'Cause one's a sham dame and t'other's a da—ow! ow!! ow!!! that hurts, I tell you; can't you take a feller o' your size?" The conundrum factory has been closed for repairs.

Planting Forests.

Minnesota Farmer:—A writer in the American Journal of Forestry, pointing out the requisites for success in stocking artifical forests, lays down two very important essentials, namely, thorough preparation of the soil and the selection of healthy and vigorous plants. Prairie and other land is to be very thoroughly ploughed and harrowed and re-harrowed till reduced to a complete state of pulverization. It will do no harm to plant the ground thus prepared for one season with corn or potatoes, in order to continue and perfect its condition. The young trees before setting out should be well examined, the writer asserting, no doubt with truth, that a very large percentage of all the forest trees planted on the northwestern prairies are practically dead before they are set out. This is especially true of evergreens, and the trouble is aggravated by the fact many planters do not know a dead evergreen from a live one, and set out much stuff which is only fit for the brush heap. This remark will apply to other than forest planting, judging from the large number of dead evergreen trees all through the country within a few months after transplanting. There is a great deficiency in the proper and intelligent care of young trees from the moment they are lifted from the nursery row till well and properly fixed in a mellow soil where they are to remain; and the remedy appears to be line upon line until owners and their employes understand that trees are to be treated with a care equal to that given to young animals, and that they cannot be thrown about and exposed to the air at the roots with impunity. No planter should value himself on his skill until he can take up and set out a thousand or even ten thousand young trees without a single lost one, for if all have a good and equal chance none will die.

Dr. D. Unger's Cure for Drunkenness.

Grand Forks Herald:—[Dr. Robert D'Unger claims to have discovered the following cure for drunkenness. Mr. Joseph Medill, editor of the Chicago Tribune, is a strong indorser of the remedy and has devoted many editorials to further its general circulation among a class of unfortunates who cannot say "no" when asked to drink. It is claimed that Dr. D'Unger has cured 28,000 persons of the worst form of intemperance by this method of treatment and that this is the first remedy ever discovered which kills the disease and the inclination to drink at the same time:

Take one pound of the best, fresh, quill-red peruvian bark, powder it and soak it in two pints of diluted alcohol. Afterward strain and evaporate it down to half a pint. Dose—A teaspoonful every three hours the first and second day, and occasionally moisten the tongue between the doses. It acts like quinine, and the patient can tell by a headache if he or she is getting too much. The third day take as previously, but reduce to one-half teaspoonful. Afterward reduce the dose to fifteen drops, and then down to ten and then to five drops. To make a cure it takes from five to fifteen days, and in extreme cases thirty days. Seven days is the average to effect a cure.

The Minneapolis Evening Journal of the 31st ult, says:—[A. E. Johnson & Co. received a telegram that the North German, Loyd steamer America and the Allen Line stemer Casper arrived at Baltimore this morning with passengers to the extent of 700 for the northwest.

Minneapolis Evening Journal:—O. O. Surley, of the firm of A. E. Johnson & Co., emigration agents, returned from Crookston this morning after a three days' inspection of crops. Crookston is the county seat of Polk county and situated on the Red Lake river, and has a population of between 5,000 and 7,000 inhabitants. Mr. Surley says farmers are in the midst of harvest, and although much dependence cannot be placed in the average estimate of the yield from a casual observance of the grain in shocks, he says the farmers generally anticipate a yield from 15 to 22 bushels per acre, and of an exceptionally good quality. The two mills, with a combined capacity 5,000 barrels per day are nearly completed, the machinery being put in its place. Mr. Linsley reports business very lively in Crookston, and is emphatic in announcing it the leading city of the northwest.

Don't Thresh until your Wheat is Dry.

Fargo Republican: A gentleman largely engaged in the wheat trade, suggested yesterday, that if farmers were not careful they would suffer damage by threshing their grain before it is dry enough, and having it heat in the bin. The gentleman says that strangely enough wheat has ripened very slowly and much of it has been cut while quite green, and if it is threshed too soon, will deteriorate or utterly spoil in the granary. A gentleman at New Buffalo commenced threshing when he thought his grain dry enough, but it was not and heats in the granary. If farmers will stack their wheat and let it remain long enough to thoroughly harden, as well as to pass through the sweating process, their grain will be heavier, brighter and will grade better.

From the Messenger.

Harvest is half over.

Merchants busy as bees.

Our sportsmen are having good luck with grouse and some large bags are reported.

Carl Kretzschmar started on a flying trip to Thief River Monday morning.

Fred Buse has commenced his dwelling on River street, Mr. Laporte has the contract, and we understand the building when completed is to cost $1,700.

Sunday night's rain was unusually heavy, and in some localities it is said there was some hail. From all that we can learn however, no damage to crops has resulted.

Twenty-five bushels an acre, of No. 1 hard is the yield many fields will show this season in the vicinity of Red Lake Falls. We have seen several fields that will be hard to beat anywhere.

Last Thursday night, the Union Congregation had a pleasant little sociable, a sort of "good bye" gathering prior to the departure of Rev. Mr. Bronson. It was well attended, and thoroughly enjoyed.

Work on Kretzschmar's dam has so far progressed that the planking in the center of the dam is now continuous to the east end. The spiling for the shore end above the dam is now being driven by contractor Pattenaud.

Mr. W. L. Sloan, of Warren, Minn, has purchased property in Kretzchmar's addition upon which he will soon build, and will locate here.

Among the arrivals last week was Mr. A. W. Eckert, of Desplaines, Ill., who was so well pleased with the prospects of our town that he secured some choice locations. Mr. Eckert will erect a handsome business block on one of them either this fall or early next spring.

Union Lake Items.

We learn from our reporter that the Union Lake Country is attracting considerable attention, Mr. West has a fine boat on the lake with sails and oars, Mr. Redland and Mr. Thos. Lawrence are improving their claims, Dr. A. A. Just and Churchill are having roads cut through the woods to their claims and will have houses built as soon as it can be done. Uncle Daniel Cameron, of Carman, will soon put a saw mill on the corner of Mr. Knowle's claim. The timber is of the best quality of oak, maple, ash and basswood. In short, things are booming and business is lively.

Judge Spendley showed us some fine samples of oats from his farm on Section 8, in Crookston. It stands up nearly as high as the Judge.

Ole Bang has gone out to his farm in the thirteen townships to superintend putting up hay and also to make arrangements to build the tar factory building.

Two stalwart Indians were on the streets on Monday anxiously inquiring of every farmer they met for a job in the harvest field and threshing. They obtained the work they sought and were happy.

The following sign, in nice large letters, appears on the Lee & Herrick roller mills: "Valley Roller Mills; Lee & Herrick." The mill is a magnificent large building and will take an active hand in reducing the No. 1 Hard to extra, super-fine flour, as soon as the first wheat appears in market.

The JOURNAL received a pleasant call on Tuesday morning from J. W. and O. M. Holmes, of Red Lake Falls. J. W. is making things red hot in the real estate line at the Falls while O. M. is busily engaged in getting out his new paper, the "Red Lake Falls Gazette," which will appear about Sept. 14th. If there is any call for another paper in the city of Red Lake Falls O. M. can fill the bill to a notch.

The reapers are running red-hot. Some are running day and night and the past week saw a vast amount of grain in the shock. This week will see nearly all of the grain that is fit to cut, in the shock and stacking well advanced. Some few farmers will thresh out of the shock but the majority will stack and allow their grain to go through the sweating process before threshing. For obvious reasons that is by far the best way to do.

On Tuesday morning Ole E. Rudi walked into our office smiling all over his countenance as he remarked; "Its a girl, born this morning, and I am a happy father again!" By the way, Ole has been after a deep well for several days. Went down 50 feet and the business caved in, then went down about 30 feet in another place, struck a large stone and on Tuesday morning commenced another well. Soon after that he came over and announced: "It is a girl!"

O. H. Lucken has invested in a hunting dog and is as happy as a clam at high-tide. It don't matter a straw whether O. H. can hit the broadside of a barn, a rod distant, with an old fusee that scatters all over Polk County, or not, didn't he pay out his little shillings for that purp to hunt, and if that purp can't hunt, Lucken is left badly. O. H. proposes to take the field about Saturday and see what the dog and he can do. He says he will take a reporter along on the first trip to write up all the chickens they knock down.

Last week we published an offer made by Mr. John Knuppe to receive and take care of grain and vegetables intended for exhibition at the Polk County Fair. Mr. K. informs us that no one has as yet brought in samples. We hoped that his office would ere this have been crowded with the wealth of Polk County products—grain and vegetables. This is a matter of vastly more importance than many imagine as we know of a great many strangers who will attend for the purpose of seeing what kind of a county we have and what it can do. If farmers cannot personally attend the fair with their samples the offer of Mr. Knuppe affords them a chance to make a good display. Owing to the fact that there is to be no other fairs held in the Northwest there will be a great many horses in attendance from different points and many that have a good record. This will attract a large crowd and is only one feature in the interesting program arranged. Every farmer, who has any interest in enhancing the value of his property ought to take interest enough in this fair to be represented at least and especially when he has an opportunity of doing so at so little cost and trouble to himself. Lets turn in and fill up Knuppe's office next Saturday or at any time when coming in town.

M. R. Berg a druggist of Grand Forks is interviewing our city for a few days.

The base ball tournament promises to be the best on record in the Northwest.

The equestriennes are practicing for the coming races on the fair grounds next week.

Boss Hinman bought a handsome row boat, while at the fair in Minneapolis, last week.

Fred Fox is nearly through cutting wheat and thinks he will have a yield of 20 bushels per acre.

Hon. Halvor Steenerson is to deliver the Annual Address at the coming fair. Everybody should hear him.

The trustees elected at the annual school meeting of Independent School District No. 1, were K. D. Chase and N. P. Stone.

The press and material for O. M. Holmes' new Red Lake Falls paper, the Gazelle went east via the old wagon route on Tuesday.

Last week Mr. M. E. Bartlett cut 100 acres of wheat on the JOURNAL farm in about four days with a Minneapolis and a Reliance self-binder.

Among the great attractions of the fair is the great ten mile running race which will be contested by two of the most noted riders in the world.

T. Thibeault, of St. Hilaire, was in on Monday and left on Tuesday with a lot of hands to work on the new elevator that is being built at that point.

Peter Cornelius has finished cutting 400 acres of grain this week. He was just nine days doing the job and intends to thresh the most of it out of the shock.

A carload of fine blooded cattle went north to Winnipeg this week. These Winnipeggers are on the right track at last it would seem by this and are bound to have some fine stock.

Rev. Fr. Riviere, the Catholic pastor, has secured the privilege of erecting a dining hall on the fair grounds and that society will cater to the wants of the hungry crowd in fine style.

T. B. Walker was interviewed by the JOURNAL man last week and, while he refused to say positively, yet we think he is sanguine of ultimate success in the sawmill project.

Mr. Henry Nolan is at home on a few days' visit. He says after all there's no place like home. He expects to be through with his job and back home for good by the time that snow flies.

Mr. Wm. Kistenmacher left for Faribault on Monday evening's train. His wife went down last week to see her sick sister and not hearing from his wife Wm. got anxious and went to join her.

The Pioneer Press in an estimate of the wheat of the Red River Valley, in its issue of Saturday last, places the average yield at 15 bushels per acre. That is nearer the mark than that paper usually gets.

Everybody lay aside your work for a few days and come to the great fair. The attractions there will be many and great and it will need only a big attendance to make it a perfect success.

Big times are expected on the fair grounds next week, among horsemen. Horses from Fergus Falls, Grand Forks and Minneapolis are expected and the boys expect lots of fun. If you want to see some good trotting get there.

All of the friends and patrons of the JOURNAL, from the country, (and we have many of them) are cordially invited to call at the JOURNAL office during fair week and look us over. They will always find a cordial welcome. Drop in and see us.

Rev. David Downie gave a lecture in the Baptist church on Tuesday evening. Subject India Illustrated. The attendance was not as large as it should have been as the subject was a good one and well handled. He will give another lecture next Monday night we are told.

If man could make the weather to suit himself he could not make an improvement on our glorious harvest weather. The prospects are that we shall have the most successful harvest that the valley has ever seen for which let us be truly grateful. What a thanksgiving day we can have this fall!

Arrangements have been completed with a band of Chippewa braves to appear on the fair grounds next week, where they will give many of their peculiar dances and other savage amusements. To those who have never witnessed these scenes, a rare source of amusement will be afforded.

The fence around the fair grounds is nearly completed; would have been entirely done if some miserable sneak had not stolen a lot of lumber. That fellow ought to be hung up by the heels suspended from a tall pole in the centre of the grounds during the fair so that all might see the meanest man in Polk County.

Mr. Chase has received news that the wheels that were to furnish power for the two roller mills were smashed up in a wreck, while in transit, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road. He expected to have had them in position and running order in ten days but this delay will set the work back three or four weeks as the wheels will have to be rebuilt.

The Tier says that the "necessary anecdotes" was administered to a blacksmith who had been kicked by a mule, with good results, but, unfortunately for the interests of science fails to say what kind of "anecdotes" were used. This might be a valuable recipe and if it will work in every case we know of lots of fellows in this city who could hang out ther shingles as doctors, if funny "anecdotes" is the only acquisition necessary.

The JOURNAL man drove the Minneapolis expert, Mr. Weaver over to the JOURNAL farm on Tuesday to see a sick reaper. Mr. W. soon had the reaper on deck and he told us enroute that the Minneapolis Reaper Co., had big improvements on the machine for next year, that he is to have one of the improved machines up in a few days. We invited him to make a trial of it in some oats we have on the JOURNAL farm on Saturday next and he said he would provided the machine arrived in time. If you want to see perfection, get there on Saturday next. For the benefit of all who do not know where the JOURNAL farm is we would say it is on Section 9 in Fairfax, just 8 miles due east of Carman.

Ye JOURNAL man enjoyed a "mess" of green corn from the JOURNAL farm, on Monday. We have a fine piece of corn on that farm that will ripen up in good shape if the frost holds off long enough.

Mr. Henry Witty, from the town of Garden, was in the city on Wednesday. He reports cutting all done in Garden and the wheat in the shock all that is not stacked already. He says that farmers anticipate a big yield of No. 1 Hard.

Messrs. Reub & Co., have rented the shop on Broadway formerly occupied by Mrs. Brin for millinery, and will commence the manufacture of cigars as soon as their material arrives. They will also retail the choicest of cigars.

Rudolph Burkhardt Esq. stands two feet more than he did since Monday; or perhaps we should say that he will just as soon as the little shavers is able to stand alone, go to school and be spanked. It is a fine lusty boy and they do say that it looks just like its dad.

Ed Walsh says he looks like a stout man, but the boys say it was fun to see how he weakened when asked to help a fair equestrienne swap horses. Jim Creighton, being used to lifting packages of choice goods, stepped promptly to Ed's relief and bore off the honors nobly.

Who is more interested in the fair than the farmers? No one should be, for it is an agricultural institution, the farmers own business, and they will consult their best interests by coming with a sample of their choice grain, vegetables, stock and everything rare or peculiar that they would wish their neighbors to see. The program is the best ever presented in the Northwest and a good time is assured from the start.

FERTILE, Sept. 1st, 1883.

Some grain has been threshed but only enough to show the quality to be No. 1 Hard, but not the quantity per acre.

Let our citizens all attend the county fair and each one have something on exhibition.

The population of Fertile was increased one by the advent of a fine 10 pound boy at Mr. Evan Grodevigs'.

A woman whose name we did not learn was hooked and badly injured by a cow. Dr. A. Nelson attended her.

Sohler & Co., are building an addition on the north end of their mill 16 feet long and the whole size of the other building; they are also putting in one more run of stone and otherwise refitting their mill to manufacture the best flour in the country.

During the severe storm of this week many of our people prepared to go into their cellars fearing one of the terrible cyclones.

La Due & Co., are prepared to take in all the wheat in exchange for goods that farmers may bring in. They will pay same price as is paid at elevator for same grades. Bring on your grain and save hauling from 10 to 20 miles.

The Hon. Knute Nelson has shown himself a friend to the people, by the efforts he has made to help deserving soldiers to their pensions, and he has succeeded in nearly every case.

Mr. Tollef Simons has his house nearly completed.

La Due & Co., will have a car of salt and lime next week.

Messrs. Otto Kankle and F. Banholz are fixing up their houses in fine shape.

Donavin's "Original" Tennesseeans Are Comming!

Donavin's Original Tennesseens, the celebrated troupe of Colored Vocalists which assisted in building the Central Tennessee College at Nashville, but not the company that fraudulently claimed to be Tennessee Jubilee Singers a year ago, will visit Crookston for the first time about Sept. 27th, and present their new and varied programme. They desire, particularly, not to be confounded with "Jubilee Singers," for the reason that they are really cultured vocalists, and present a strictly first-class concert. We have before us the most favorable press notices, which guarantee us in promising one of the best of entertainments. We clip the following from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of June 8th 1883.

Like many good things of this life the Tennesseeans improve with the years. The audience which assembled to hear them at Market Hall, St. Paul, last evening, would have packed the Opera house to overflowing and the testimonials of delights at the vocalism of the septet were loud and frequent. The camp meeting hymns and choruses seemed to meet with favor, though the higher class of selections were exceptionally well rendered. The troup is well worthy of patronage, and receives a large share wherever it appears. The Tennesseeans will appear at the Mathomedi assembly August 9, 10 and 11, and in St. Paul about the 15th of October.

Mr. John Alderman has been appointed Town Clerk of this town by the Supervisors' and he has taken possession of the books. S. H. Johnson, our townsman, has been engaged helping Mr. Alderman straighten up the records. They are now, all O. K. and you will not have to go to the town of Rockstad to hunt up the Town Clerk of this town.

Judge Ives intends to spend the winter in Washington, and will assist the Hon. Knute Nelson in getting an appropriation from the government to clear the Red Lake River between here and Red Lake, so that steamers can run. This will be of great importance to St. Hilaire. A stock company has already been formed, and steamboats will be built and run in the near future. Mr. Ives is a practical, far-seeing gentleman, and is working hard for the interests of St. Hilaire.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

Last year just before the carnival, there [illegible] a report in Hunebourg that the world [illegible] coming to an end. Doctor Zacharias [illegible], of Colmar, first spread this dis[illegible]able news: it was spoken of in the Lame Messenger, in the Perfect Christian, and in fifty other journals.

Zacharias Piper had calculated that a comet would descend from the skies on Shrove Tuesday, having a tail formed of boiling water, one hundred and five million miles in length, melt the snow on the highest mountains, wither the trees, and burn up everybody.

A learned man named Popinot had written from Paris to say that there was no doubt that the comet would come, but that its tail would be composed of such light vapors as to cause no one the least inconvenience: that people might go on quietly with their business; that he would answer for everything. This assurance allayed much alarm.

But, unfortunately, there lives at Hunebourg, in the little street of the "Three Jugs," an old wool-spinner named Maria Finck. She is a little, pale, withered old woman covered with wrinkles, whom people go and consult on the most delicate and important affairs of life. She lives in a low room, the ceiling of which is painted with eggs, red and blue stripes, gilded nuts, and a thousand other fanciful objects. She dresses herself up in old finery, and lives on eckaude, which two things gave her great authority in the neighborhood. Maria Finch, instead of approving of M. Popinot's opinion, declared herself to be on the side of Zacharias Piper, and kept saying; "Be converted and pray; repent of your sins, and give to the church, for the end of the world is at hand—the end is at hand!"

At the furthest end of her room was a picture of hell, to which people were going down by a path all sown with roses. None of them seemed to have a suspicion about the place to which this road was leading them; they were dancing along, some with bottles in their hands, some with hams, others with strings of sausages. A workman, with ribbons flying from his hat, was playing the clarionet to amuse them on their way. Some were kissing their partners, and all of these poor wretches were heedlessly approaching the pit full of flames, into which already the foremost were falling, their arms extended and their legs in the air.

So most of the people of Hunebourg agreed that they would have no carnival but spend Shrove Tuesday in acts of repentance. Never had such a thing been heard of before. The adjutant and captain, as well as the non-commissioned officers in the garrison at Hunebourg, were quite in despair. All the preparations for the fete—the decorations of the great hall of the mayoralty with moss and trophies of arms; the stage raised for the orchestra; the beer, kirsch, and bischoz, ordered for refreshments—in short, all arrangements were to be of no use, since the young ladies of the town would no longer hear a word about dancing.

But with all this, those who were most distressed and disappointed were Daniel Spitz, the secretary of the mayoralty; Jerome Bertha, the postmaster's son; Dujardin, the tax-collector; and I. A week before we had gone to Strasbourg on purpose to buy ourselves fancy costumes. Uncle Tobias had given me fifty franc out of his own pocket, so that I need spare nothing. I, therefore had chosen for myself, at Mademoiselle Dardenai's, the costume of a clown. This consists of a kind of skirt, with wide folds and long sleeves, trimmed with onion-shaped buttons as big as one's fist, which are set so close from the throat down to the knee as to rattle against each other. A little black skull-cap is to be worn on the head, and the face whitened with flour. Provided one has a long nose, and deep, sunken eyes, the effect is admirable.

Dujardin, because of his fat paunch, had chosen a Turkish costume, embroidered up all the seams; Spitz, the dress of punch, made of a thousand pieces of red, green, and yellow stuff—a hump in front, one behind, and a great gendarme's hat to be worn on the back of his head; nothing could be better. Jerome Bertha was to be a savage, and was to have a plume of parrot's feathers. We felt sure beforehand that all the young girls would leave the soldiers to have us as their partners. And after having spent all this money, was it not enough to set one against the whole human race, to see everything go to the deuce, all through the stupidity of an old mad woman, or of a Zacharias Piper!

At last Shrove Tuesday arrived; the sky was heavy with snow. One looked right and left, up and down—no comet was to be seen. The girls all seemed bewildered. Off ran the young fellows to the houses of their cousins, aunts, and grandmothers, saying, "You see now that old mother Finck is mad, and that there's no sense whatever in your notions about the commet. Do comets ever come in the winter? Do they not always choose the vintage time? Well, well, you must now decide—there's still time," etc., etc.

The soldiers, on their side, went into the kitchens, and talked to the maid servants, exhorting them, and loading them with reproaches. Many people began to pluck up courage. The old men and women went arm in arm to see the decoration of the great hall of the mayoralty; the stars made of sabres and the little tricolored flags between the windows excited universal admiration. Then people's minds began to change; they remembered that it was Shrove Tuesday. Suddenly all the young ladies made haste to get their smart petticoats out of their cupboards, and to wax their shoes.

By ten o'clock the great hall of the mayoralty was full of people; we had carried the day; there was not a single girl in Hunebourg who did not answer to the call. The clarionets, the trombones, the big drums, resounded; the lights sparkled in the windows, the country dances went merrily; the waltzers whirled round madly; the young men and girls were in a state of wild enjoyment; the old grandmothers seated against the walls were laughing heartily. At the refreshment counters people were shoving each other about; the drinks could not be furnished quick enough, and father Zimmerman, who had a contract for the supply, might boast of feathering his nest well that night.

Those who had taken rather too much began to stumble down the staircase. The snow kept continually falling. Uncle Tobias had given me the house-key, so that I might go home when I liked. Till two o'clock I did not miss a single waltz, but by that time I had had enough; the refreshments were getting into my head. I started on my way for the street Saint Silvester, groping along the wall, and reasoning with myself as I went. I had walked on in this way for about ten minutes, and was just going to turn the corner by the fountain, when, happening by chance to look up, I saw behind the trees a moon as red as a hot coal, coming right at me through the skies. It was still millions of miles away, but it was moving so fast that it would be over us in a quarter of an hour. The sight almost knocked me down; I felt my hair already shriveling up, and I said to myself: "It is the comet! Zacharias Piper was right! And, without knowing what I was doing, I ran to the mayoralty, climbed up the stairs, upsetting those who were coming down, and cried out in a terrified voice: "The comet! the comet!"

The dance was at its merriest; the big drum was thundering; the young fellows were stamping their feet; the girls were as red as poppies; but when my voice was heard in the room, crying: "The comet! the comet!" there was a profound silence, and every one turned pale.

Sergeant Duchene, darting to the door, seized hold of me, put his hand over my mouth, and said: "Are you mad? Hold your tongue; will you?"

But I staggered backwards, kept repeating in a tone of despair: "The comet! The comet!"

Immediately a thundering of footsteps was to be heard down the staircase; everyone rushed out, the women groaning—indeed, the uproar was fearful. In a few minutes the room was quite empty. Duchene left me, and being exhausted, I leaned on a window-sill, and watched the people running up and down the street; then I went off, too, mad with despair.

On the steps outside a number of people were seated, and were confessing to each other. One said: "I have been a usurer;" another, "I have used false weights;" another, "I have cheated at cards." They were all talking together, and from time to time they interrupted themselves to cry for mercy. Among them I recognized the old baker, Fevre, and mother Lauritz; they were striking their breasts, and looking perfectly miserable.

But I did not pay much attention to all those things, for I had sins enough of my own to think of.

I soon caught up to those who were running to the fountain. There it was terrible indeed to hear the groanings. Every one saw immediately that it was really a comet; and as for me, I thought that it had already doubled in size. It seemed to be darting out lightnings, and the profound blackness of the night made it appear as red as blood. The crowd kept repeating in a voice of lamentation:

"It is finished! it is finished! we are lost!"

The women called on Saint Joseph, Saint Christopher, Saint Nicholas—in short, on all the saints in the calender. At this moment every sin I had ever committed seemed to come before my mind, and I felt a horror of myself. I trembled from head to foot as I thought that we were now going to be burnt. On his crutches, close by me, was the old beggar Balthazar. "When you are in heaven you will remember me—will you not?" I said to him.

He replied, sobbing: "I am myself a great sinner, Monsieur Christian; I have been deceiving the parish for these thirty years, from the love of idleness, for I am not as lame as you think."

"As for me, Balthazar," I went on, "I am the greatest criminal in Hunebourg."

We were almost weeping in each other's arms.

We had all been on our knees there for a quarter of an hour, when Sergeant Duchene arrived, quite out of breath. He had run first to the arsenal, and seeing nothing down there, came back by the street of the Capuchins.

"Well," said he, "what on earth made you cry out?"

Then, perceiving the comet: "Thunder alive!" exclaimed he, "what is that?"

"It is the end of the world, sergeant," said Balthazar.

Duchene drew his sabre, and gliding along against the wall, exclaimed:

"Forward! What do I care for it? I'll reconnoitre."

Every one admired his courage; as for me, I was quite carried away by his audacity, and determined to follow him. We walked along slowly, staring at the comet, which kept increasing visibly in size, as if it were traveling millions of miles every second.

At last we arrived at the corner of the old convent of the Capuchins. The comet now appeared to mount up; the more we advanced the more it mounted; we were obliged to raise our heads; at last Duchene had quite to bend his neck backward and look straight up into the air. I was a few steps further off, and was looking at the comet a little sideways. I was considering within myself if it were prudent to go any further, when suddenly the sergeant stopped, and said in a low voice:

"Good heavens! it is the street lantern!"

"The lantern!" I exclaimed, running forward, "can it be so?"

I looked up quite wonder-struck. It was indeed the old lantern of the Capuchin convent. It is not usually lit, because there have been no monks there since 1793, and because the inhabitants of Hunebourg generally go to bed with the cocks and hens; but on this night, the watchman, Burrhus, foreseeing that there would be a good many tipsy people about, before he went to bed himself charitably thought he would put a candle in the old lantern, so as to prevent people from tumbling into the ditch which goes along by the old cloisters. We could not clearly distinguish the lantern between the branches of the trees. The stuff of the lantern was as thick as one's thumb, and when there was a little gust of wind, this stuff caught fire, and threw out, as it were, flashes of lightning, and this was what seemed to move forward like a comet. When I saw all this, I was just going to call out to let the rest of the people know, when the sergeant stopped me, saying: "Hold your tongue! If it were known that we had made a charge at a lantern, we should be finely laughed at. Listen to me. Attention!"

He unhooked the rusty chain, the lantern fell, making a tremendous noise. After this off we ran.

The next morning there was a report that the comet had been extinguished through the prayers of Maria Finck; so from that day she was looked on even as more of a saint than before.

The Happy Answer That Secured a Reporter an Advance in Salary.

A young journalist who received his early professional training on the New York Sun, related an incident of his experience with Charles A Dana. The young man had been sent out to interview a prominent democrat upon the political situation, and stumbled across a radical republican, from whom he also secured an interview, which he placed upon the managing editor's desk. As the opinions expressed by the republican were wholly at variance with the platform of the Sun, the managing editor put a decided damper upon the enterprise of the youthful reporter, and Mr. Dana happening to overhear the conversation, addressed the innocent scribe:

"Haven't you been here long enough yet to know the policy of this paper?"

"The only policy I know, sir," said the young man, "is that the Sun shines for all."

"Very true," replied Mr. Dana, "but you must know that most of our readers can't stand the full light of the orb of day, and we have to give them only such light as is reflected by the moon."

"Oh, you want me to give them moonshine, do you, sir?" coolly retorted the unabashed knight of the quill.

Mr. Dana turned upon his heel without a word, a smile lurking about his lips, and left the room. Two days afterward, when the reporter went to the office for his pay, the cashier informed him that it had been raised $2 a week.—[Boston Times.

A BOLT FROM A CLEAR SKY.

The Hawaiin Earthquake of 1837 Described for the First Time by an Eye Witness:

From Missionary Coan's New Book.

On the 7th of November, 1837, at the hour of evening prayers, we were startled by a heavy thud and a sudden jar of the earth. The sound was like the fall of some vast body upon the beach, and in a few seconds the noise of mingled voices rising for a mile along the shore thrilled us like the wail of doom. Instantly this was followed by a like wail from all the native houses around us. I immediately ran down to the sea, where a scene of wild ruin was spread out before me, the sea, moved by an unseen hand, had, all on a sudden, risen in a gigantic wave, and this wave, rushing in with the speed of a race-horse, had fallen upon the shore, sweeping everything not more than fifteen or twenty feet above high water into indiscriminate ruin. Houses, furniture, fuel, timber, canoes, food, clothing, everything floated wild upon the flood. About two hundred people, from the old man and woman of threescore years and ten to the new-born infant, stripped of their earthly all were struggling in the tumultuous waves.

So sudden and unexpected was the catastrophe that the people along the shore were literally "eating and drinking," and they "knew not until the flood came and swept them all away." The harbor was full of strugglers calling for help, while frantic parents and children, wives and husbands ran to and fro along the beach seeking for their lost ones. As wave after wave came in and retired the strugglers were brought near the shore, where the more vigorous landed with desperate efforts and the weaker and exhausted were carried back upon the retreating wave, some to sink and rise no more till the noise of judgment wakes them.

THE CHILDREN.

Give us light amid our darkness;
Let us know the good from ill.
Hate us not for all our blindness;
Love us, lead us, show us kindness—
You can make us what you will.

We shall be what you will make us—
Make us wise, and make us good!
Make us strong for time of trial;
Teach us temperance, self-denial,
Patience, kindness fortitude!

—Mary Howitt.

NO REST FOR THE WEARY.

"Now at least I'll have one hour to myself, and a great pleasure it'll be too, to know that the house is still for once and I can be left alone with my own musings, and not be afraid every moment that some one will come in suddenly upon me driving away all my pleasant thoughts. No, thank fortune I'm alone, for the children are at school and Jim has gone to the village.

"I don't intend to work very hard either, for if a woman can't have one hour out of twelve to rest, I think its a pity."

So saying, Mrs. Smith sat down with a woe-be-gone expression on her face, such as is only seen in the countenances of those poor weary souls who always look on the dark side of life, making themselves and all around them unhappy.

"Let me see, why, I believe I haven't read last week's paper yet, and no wonder when I have to perform the duties of matron, seamstress, chambermaid, cook, waiter, washerwoman, dairy-maid and what not, busy from morning till night scarcely taking time to breathe for fear something will be left undone.

For my part I can't see why I have to work so hard and have no time to rest, excepting when I'm asleep, while on the contrary, the men seem to take it easy. They come in at noon, eat their dinners and have an hour's nooning as they call it, while the teams are feeding.

All this time I have to keep at work, and by the time the dishes are washed and a hundred and one other things attended to it is supper time, then maid of all work must fly around and have supper ready precisely on time, or there will be growling from the other side of the house.

As soon as the men have eaten their supper and finished the chores at the barn—which, by the way don't take more than thirty minutes, for many hands make light work—they come in, sit down, talk, smoke, chew, read the daily papers, lounge around and enjoy themselves in general.

While they are thus enjoying themselves, I poor soul, with these two tired hands have to wash dishes again and prepare breakfast, and then when I'm almost tired to death, if I happen to sit down to rest for two or three seconds, Jim is sure to have some odd job or other to set me at. To keep me out of mischief, he says.

I think if the truth was ever written it was in those lines:

"Man works from sun to sun,
Woman's work is never done."

If Jim would only let me have a girl to help me, but no, every time I mention it he's always 'so poor, can't afford it.' But he's got to afford to bury me some time, and that soon, if I have to keep on working in this way.

Then I wonder where my hard earnings will go to? I suppose to support wife number two, to dress her in style so she can entertain visitors and make calls while Bridget does the work in the kitchen. That's the way it generally goes. Jim wouldn't get another wife to do as I have done, one who would be so meek and gentle. No, sir, I tell you what, he'd have to stand around, it would be his turn to be lamb like.

But I wouldn't care so much, if he didn't have so much help himself, two hired men all the time, and if he happens to get in a hurry he goes and hires more, never stopping to think anything about the affording part.

Now I don't believe in this way of doing business. I like to see things balance. There's Mrs. Simpkins, she seems to have plenty of time, takes two or three magazines, and newspapers by the dozen, and after doing her work and reading all these has time to make her weekly round of calls, while I seldom get into a neighbor's house from one year's end to the other. I can't see how it is, but some people do have a way of geting through with their work that I don't understand. I'll warrant she don't cook much though. Now I think of it the men folks over there do look kind of haggard and starved like. My! Jim would be as cross as a bear, if I didn't have soup, two or three kinds of vegetables, puddings, pies and everything else on the table for dinner. But I suppose that is partly my fault, for they say before I came here Jim had to put up with anything he could get and not much of that.

I remember when I was at home sister Sue used to say I'd spoil any man if I had my way about the cooking, and I don't know but what she prophesied aright that time. But I'll remember next time when I get mar—

My! supposing some person was listening. Of course Jim is going to live. Dear me what a commotion my thoughts are in. I wonder why it is that I can't think without speaking my thoughts. Jim says I'm always talking to myself when I'm alone, but I can't help it, it's natural.

I declare, its almost time for the children to come home and I haven't read any yet. I must, for I've heard it said, we must read a little every day if but fifteen minutes, it will make itself felt at the end of every year.

Wonderful invention—phonograph, a talking machine! What a labor-saving invention. Just the thing I want, for it is so hard for me to talk. It tires me almost to death. If I only had one of these machines I would set one of the children to turning the crank, and it would do the talking instead of me. What a great relief it would be! Then Jim would enjoy it so much I know, for he likes to listen to any one talking, and it being such an effort for me to talk, if it wasn't for the children poor fellow, he'd get lonesome.

There, now, those children are coming and I've got to get supper again. Oh, dear! I did think I'd get a little time to rest to-day, but no fate's against me. No rest for the weary!—Rural New Yorker.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Fruits for the Northwest.

L. D., Bismarck, Dak.—What varieties of apples would be likely to do best in the neighborhood of Iron Mountain for an orchard of 400 trees for family use and market? How many summer, fall, and winter apples should there be? What, also, would be the most desirable cherries, plums, pears, strawberries, currants, and raspberries?

As.—Not knowing the location of "Iron Mountain," we assume it to be in Dakota, near Bismarck. There is probably little or no experience with fruits in that region; hence we are guided mainly by the recommendations of fruit-growers in the similar climate of Minnesota, especially so far as apples are concerned. Selecting from their list of last year, we name: For summer, 50 Tetofski; for Autumn, 50 Duchesse of Oldenburg; for early Winter, 150 Wealthy; for late Winter, 150 Minnesota. The success of pears in that climate, we regard as quite doubtful—Osband's Summer, Flemish Beauty, Sheldon, and Beurre d'Anjou are as likely to succeed as any others. If any plums will stand Dakota Winters, they are likely to be such natives as Miner, Weaver, or others of northern parentage. Cherries, none but Morellos—Early Richmond, English Morello, or Late Morello are hardy and good. Currants, Red Dutch, White Grape, Cherry and Victoria. Raspberries, Black-Caps only—Souhegan, Tyler, Ohio, Gregg. Strawberries, Duchess Crescent, Wilson, Kentucky.—Rural New Yorker.

The Hop Crop in England.

The reports from England indicate a heavy crop of hops in all the counties where this plant is cultivated, which of course is not good news for our hop growers. In some of the counties where the plants were injured last season by blight, they have entirely revived, and are now carrying a large crop. In Kent the vines are said to be very clean and healthy, while at Surrey the growth of the hop plant is said to be unparalleled. A correspondent at Robertsbridge says: "If the present weather continues, they will grow in that district one of the best crops on record." Reports from all parts of the country are similar to the above, and, unless some unforeseen enemy appears, the hop crop of England in 1883 will far exceed the highest average. It is quite likely that our hop growers will be compelled to accept a rather low price for their hops this season as a kind of an offset for the high one of last.—New York Sun.

Eggs With Dark Colored Shells.

The old idea that hens' eggs with dark colored shells are richer and better than those with light, is again revived, and several of our agricultural contemporaries are discussing the subject with considerable earnestness. A New England paper informs us that the dark shell Brahma eggs command six to ten cents a dozen in Boston market more than any of the light colored varieties, while a newspaper in Maine tells us that the eggs of the Plymouth Rocks are much richer than those of the brown Leghorns, or any others with white shells. While this may be true, it looks to us very much as though the breeders of certain varieties of our domestic fowls had taken this way to push their favorites to the front. We certainly believe that there is a difference in the flavor of eggs of the different breeds, but do not think the color of the shell has anything to do with it. As a rule, the larger the egg the stronger the flavor, and this may be what some persons are seeking when they select the large, dark-colored eggs.

Agricultural Notes.

Some wise ones say you must cut your timber for posts and poles in August if you want them desirable. Root sprouts will not come up if cut now.

A butter-maker, writing to the Iowa Homestead, says the best butter color is a pailful of cornmeal mush, fed warm once a day, the corn to be of the yellow variety; adding that it will increase the milk as well as give a good color.

One of the best-posted cattle dealers in Elgin, Ill., states that within a radius of fifteen miles of that city not less than 80,000 head of cows are kept for use in the dairy, and that the annual waste is 10 per cent. or 8,000 head, and that but a trifle over 1 per cent. of the calves are raised, which makes it necessary to import about 7,000 cows to keep up the dairy herds of the country.

An epicure says, "He who would eat fruit in perfection must partake of strawberries and gooseberries in England, cherries and apricots in France, and melons and peaches in the United States."

A bushel of grapes can be raised as cheaply as a bushel of potatoes, says Captain John B. Moore, of Concord, Mass. There is but little drain on the farm for manure in growing grapes after the first start—less than with almost any other crop. The vines thrives on comparatively poor land also. Taken one year with another, the grape is a profitable crop. It delights in a light soil, with a southerly or southeasterly exposure.

The oldest asparagus plants can be set out this fall, but we have always practised and advised setting two-year-old plants in the spring. One year old plants will grow, but it is easier to tend the plants as seedlings till two or three years old before setting, than it is to transplant small ones and lose half of them, and have them reset. Asparagus once set is perennial, and it pays to be thorough in setting it. The only way to hurry up the crop is by manure and deep cultivation previous to setting. Set in sandy loam; where it can be overflowed annually by fresh or salt water, it does the best. We set in rows 2 1-2 feet apart, and eight to ten inches between plants for field cultivation, and thicker for the garden, say one foot apart each way. In field cultivation set the crowns deep enough to permit shallow ploughing in of manure.—N. E. Homestead.

Domestic Recipes.

RICH JUMBLES.—Rub to a cream a pound of butter and a pound of sugar, mix with a pound and a half of flour, four eggs, and a very little brandy, roll the cakes in powdered sugar, lay them on flat buttered tins, and bake in a quick oven.

NEW POTATOES cooked in this way make a dainty breakfast dish: Put a large lump of butter in a frying-pan, stir in with it as it softens a tablespoonful of flour, a small onion chopped fine and a little parsley; lastly, a small cup of sweet cream. Stir until these are well mixed, then put in the cold boiled potatoes, cut in small pieces. Let all boil together. Serve hot.

COOKIES.—One cup of sour cream; two cups of sugar; a piece of butter size of an egg; carraway seed; one teaspoonful soda and salt. Mix soft and bake in a quick oven.

MOUNTAIN CAKE.—One cup of milk; one-half cup butter; one cup sugar; two cups flour; two eggs; two teaspoonfuls of cream-of-tartar; one of soda: bake in gem-pans.

BLACKBERRY PUDDING.—A pudding dish filled nearly half full of nice, ripe berries; tea-cup or two-thirds full of sugar to be sprinkled over them. Butter size of a hickory-nut. Add cold water nearly to the top of the berries; last shift over them two tablespoonfuls of flour.

FOR CRUST.—One teacup of sour cream; two-thirds teaspoonful of soda and a little salt. Mix as soft as can be rolled out; place over the berries, the same as for chicken-pie, and bake in the same way. To dish the pudding cut in pieces, lay on your dishes, and dip berries and juice over the crust for dressing.

The Sunflower as an Industrial Plant.

It may not be generally known that the sunflower (Helianthus annuus), which has lately been brought into such notoriety by the "æsthetic" school, has considerable claims to attention from an industrial point of view. Its somewhat nut-like seeds—or, as Baron Ferdinand von Muller describes them, "seed-like nutlets"—afford an excellent oil, which is not only useful as a lubricant for machinery, but is one of the best of table oils. The seeds, again, afford admirable food for poultry, the stocks furnish a good textile fibre, and the blossoms yield a brilliant, lasting yellow dye. So highly does Baron von Muller think of the virtues of the plant that he includes it in his list of selected plants suitable for acclimatization and industrial cultivation in the colony of Victoria. As much as fifty bushels of seedlings have been obtained from an acre of ground, under favorable conditions, and as much as fifty gallons of oil can be pressed from such a crop. When he states that about six pounds of seeds are required to sow an acre, from which such an enormous return is possible, it is scarcely surprising to be told that "the return from a sunflower field is attained within a few months." The plants, the same authority states, prefer calcareous soil. Baron von Muller, however, has not by any means exhausted the list of virtues which the plant possesses. The Chinese, who have so far appreciated its properties as to use its fibre in adulterating and dyeing their silk fabrics, and its oil not only as a lubricant but as an illuminant, state that its flowers supply the best bee food, and that the "cake" left after expressing the oil is superior to linseed cake as a food for cattle. The leaves are also employed as a substitute for or for mixing with tobacco, and as an ingredient in soap manufacture the oil is highly prized.

Domestic Economy.

There is much more room for choice in the administration of even a small income than one is apt to believe at first thought. It is not the luxuriousness of wealth that is enviable, but the broader and more various outlets and inlets which it offers for life. Every income may be studied with reference to these possibilities and the result will often be surprising. An hour's serious consideration of so serious a subject as the uses of money, with last year's expense book beside her, and pencil and note book in hand, would, perhaps, suggest to almost every house mother some portion of her economy in which she might wisely turn over a new leaf. If she has not a well-kept account book to refer to, that is the first leaf to turn. Comfort and elegance in dress, table service, furniture, equipages—all the surroundings of our lives—these are good and desirable when they do not involve the sacrifice of anything more important; but it is well to remember that they are not to be the chief objects of life, nor the ends for the attainment of which homes are ordained. If we do not desire for our children better things than these, if we do not assume for them higher responsibilities, we are promoting that dangerous tendency toward an exaggerated respect for wealth, and a corresponding depreciation of character which is the growing peril of our nation and our time. As American mothers, let us, while considering the division of time and the apportionment of income, not forget in the maintenance of health and comfort in our households, the equally important claims of intellectual life, religion, social development, human helpfulness, and the high ideals of a pure pursuit of truth and beauty.—D. H. R. Goodale in Our Continent.

Training of Daughters.

Do mothers of this country ever reflect upon the degree of responsibility that rests upon them in the moral training of their daughters? The columns of the daily journals recording the downfall of girls ought to awaken parents to a serious consideration of their duties. The father is not without his share of this responsibility, but it is to the mother more particularly that the daughter should turn at the most dangerous period of her life, for counsel. The relations between mother and daughter are more closely in sympathy with regard to those matters of moment to the female mind than those between father and daughter; or, at least, they should be, and are, where the mother is awake to the full measure of her duty. It is so easy for the mother to possess the entire confidence of her daughter, and as the sharer of those tender secrets which enter into the lives of young women to guide and direct her aright.

THE MAID OF CHERBURY.

An English Seaside Story.

"Only one more voyage, Rachel."

"Oh, but coffin ships, Harry! The word haunts me!"

"But only one more run, my bonny bird! Just to Aberdeen in ballast, an' back again to Harwich with granite before we know we've been out. Then we shan't have to start life in debt, lass; every penny o' the share in George's boat be paid up; an' the little craft from that time for'ard shall keep a good thick thatch over our heads, an' aside o'bacon in the kitchen, an' a pig in the sty—a raal Barkshire, my pretty one!"

The ring of solid comfort in this last allusion momentarily displaces all gruesome thoughts. The rosiest pair of lips in Cherbury are put up trustfully, to be kissed with a vigor which only a young sailor, due aboard his ship within two fleeting hours, is capable of imparting to the salutation. After this there is a delightful pause, while the August filtering its way between the mossy piles of Cherbury jetty, beneath which the lovers stand, surrounds their figures with a golden halo.

"What's that they tell me about Farmer Gordon havin' been so often up at your mother's while I was away, last voyage?" suddenly demanded the sailor. "Of course there's nowt in it, sweetheart: but I don't like to hear, as I did the other night, the names o' Tom Gordon an' Rachel Cheal bein' coupled together so free-and-easy like although Tom is old enough to be your father."

For a moment Rachel gazes into her lover's face in bewilderment; then, clasping his hand in both of hers, leans back against a weather beaten bulkhead, while musical laughter ripples from her rosy lips.

"Oh! but where have your eyes been, Harry, my man?" she asks, as soon as she is able to speak; then she continues, very demurely, "As thou sayest, lad, he is often up at mother's: an' he is old enough, an' to spare, to be my father: an'——"

"Let him bide, my lass; let him bide. I can trust thee with any man of 'em all," interrupts her lover impetuously, as he hurriedly glances off to the foot of the lane which leads down to Cherbury Cove. "Here be George, an' little Jim, and your uncle Humphrey; an' that means it's dead low water, an' I must slip off at once if I'm to make Harwich this flood. God bless thee, my pretty one!" And he holds her to his heart in a clinging embrace, while a stentorian shout for "Ha-ry-y-y! Harry Ree-e-eed!" awakens the echoes of the cove.

"Aye, aye, George! aye, aye!" cries Harry in response. Then the two lovers emerge from the seclusion of the jetty, and join the group on the foreshore; and, after a hurried greeting, Harry puts off with George and little Jim in the boat to which hopeful allusion has been already made, and slips away before a gentle breeze from the northward in the direction of Harwich Harbor. It is not until the little craft has rounded Cherbury Point, and is lost to view, that Rachel's kerchief ceases to flutter in the air, and Rachel herself consents to turn and retrace her steps with her uncle to the village.

The Cheals are a family of which Cherbury has occasion to feel proud. Humphrey, a veteran of Her Majesty's Coast Guard, is a man who, holding his own life cheap, has again and again voluntarily encountered deadly peril at humanity's call, and is known and respected throughout the whole county. Though now close upon sixty years of age, he still hold the onerous post of coxswain of the lifeboat; and if the blessings are due, it is then on his good gray head that they should descend in showers, for many have been called down by the wives whom he has saved from widowhood. Stowed away in a locker in his trim little cottage on the North Down, and only visible on ceremonial occasions, are two medals—the Humane Society's and the Albert; and other decorations would be his beside, were it not that he is as modest as he is brave and holds that saving a fellow-creature's life is a duty, and not, to use his own words, an affair to go and make a fuss about.

Humphrey Cheal has two sons—George the elder, Harry Reed's bosom friend and partner, a stalwart young fellow on whom the honorable society of the elder brethern of Trinity House have already conferred the certificate for pilotage duty in the Estuary; and little Jim, the younger, a blue-eyed urchin of fourteen, who can handle oar or tiller with any lad of his own age and weight in the village. It has been a somewhat tender point with Humphrey, in his earlier life, that his family had no daughter, but this deficiency had since been supplied, his sister-in-law, Rachel, who, in due course had grown to be the very apple of her uncle's eye. To her, the most lovable maid in all Cherbury, the gentle reader has already been introduced under the jetty.

"Tis a cruel, cruel task, is parting!" she sighs, as she wends her way up the lane by Humphrey's side; "and 'twould break my heart, uncle, if this voyage was not Harry's last!"

"Right you be, my bonnie lamb right you be. Parting is a heavy business at the best, an' that's Bible truth," assented Humphrey. "But then, you know, we mustn't take on when we're right in sight o'port, so to speak," he continues in a more cheery tone. "Why bless my heart, I shouldn't a bit surprised, if you were to anchor up there an'd tell me, as pert as mebbe, that Harry had gone and bespoke Sheldrake's cottages, afore h'dd started."

"Aye, bless the lad! that he did, uncle; bespoke the cottage, an' what's more, bespoke the pig! Just the plumpest little chap I've seen this many a day—as round an' soft an' beautiful as—as——" Her eyes beam softly over the retrospect, and the smile is lost.

"I'm main glad to hear it, my lass," comments Humphrey, thoughtfully; "for ther's no denyin' that I'd wish to see thee settled all comfortable, if so be that any other change in the family is to come about. I've heard folks talkin' a deal o' late, my dear; couplin your mother's name with that o' Farmer Gordon.'

A merry laugh issues spontaneously from Rachel's lips. "His very words! uncle; Harry's very words! Heard folks couplin' Rachel Cheal's name wi' that o' Tom Gordon! But the queer part o' the tale is, my bonny lad thought that Rachel Cheal was me, uncle—me an' not mother." And over the recollection she laughs the tears back into her eyes.

Humphrey laughs too; and thus, laughing and chatting, the old coastguardsman and the maid Rachel make their way out of the lane, and disappear in the direction of the little cottage on the North Down.

Meanwhile, Rachel's lover has reached Harwich harbor and joined his ship, the coasting brig Auld Reekie, which sets sail on the morrow morn for the port of Aberdeen. With fair breezes from the south and west, she makes a good run of it, loads her cargo of granite, and again quits port. By this time the summer has waned, and the period of the autumn equinox is at hand. At sunrise of the fourth day of her homeward voyage the brig encounters strong head winds from the southeast; before sunset it is blowing half a gale, and an hour afterward—with her foresail in ribbons and the foreyard in splinters—she has put about, and is making a last blind effort to run for the mouth of the Tees.

A grim object, to the sea-faring eye, is the Auld Reekie. For five-and-forty years, fair weather and foul, she has been knocking up and down the east coast of Great Britain in search of a livelihood—now carrying wood, now stone—and a storm-beaten, patched up, unseaworthy old hulk she looks, through all her three coats of paint. To catch sight of the line where now the Plimsoll mark would be, the observer, it was averred, would have to station himself a couple of boats length off her weather beam; and even then it would be necessary for a good stiff breeze to lay her over at an angle of forty-five degrees to her head line, before his curiosity could be assuaged. Such is the vessel in which Harry Reed has shipped as mate, and which—with her foremast gone by the board, her 250 tons of dead weight of granite shifting in her hold, and her rotten sails blown to rags—is staggering along in the inky darkness before the awful fury of the equinox. Like many another coffin-ship before her, she is allowed short shift. In a few minutes a terrific sea—eager, as it were, to put her out of her misery—takes her on the counter and makes a clean sweep of deck; and at the same moment she reels, shudders, and finally plunges down headlong into the yawning gulf which opens to receive her.

And Harry Reed? In this instance vigorous young life, sustained by might of purpose, does not succumb quite so readily as rotten old timber. For two nights and two days, awful privation and suffering are his; but at length—numbed, bruised, lacerated, and with the death stupor, stealing upon him—he is observed and picked up by an outward-bound vessel.

In due course he recovers, and, enrolled as one of the hands proceeds with the ship of Valparaiso, whither she is bound direct. There, with the present of a silver coin and many elaborate directions he entrusts to a hanger-on of the harbor an English letter—a wild out-pouring of all the long-pent passion of his heart—to be posted in the town. What eventually became of that poor, painfully produced sheet no one living knows. Possibly the drunken tatterdemalion to whom was handed—a Spanish half-caste—put it to practical use as cigarette paper, and its rapsodies, like many other lovers' rapsodies, drifted away in smoke; more probably it lies hidden in the greasy lining of his jacket to this day. One thing is certain that it never reached the suppliant hand stretched forth to receive it; or brought relief to the soul famishing for news in the little old-world village beyond the Atlantic.

From Valparaiso the ship at length returns to Lisbon, with copper ore, and from Lisbon she starts with a general cargo for—word must musical to one, at least of the crew—Ipswich. Once more in the Downs, where she lies three days wind-bound, English newspapers are received abroad, and one of these, in a column devoted to local intelligence, a young sailor spells out among other items, that a marriage has been celebrated just three weeks previously, between one Thomas Gordon and one Rachel Cheal.

And the fair maid of Cherbury—what of her? Verily, she, too, like her lover, has passed through the valley of the shadow of death, as her wasted face and great lustrous eyes bear record. Day in, day out, fair weather or foul, she must needs stray aimlessly to the beach, where the last kiss lingered upon her cheek and the last good-by was whispered. She is never alone. Honest Humphrey—broken in spirit now and bowed with grief, yet loving his poor shorn lamb still more tenderly than of yore—is ever at her side, and to murmured questions—the expression of the passionate yearning that is within her as she gazes upon the waters of the bay, and beyond the horizon—will give answer in softened words, hopeless himself, yet reluctant to crush the last fluttering vestige of hope.

It is in the gladsome sunshine of a young May morning that a gallant ship, which has voyaged from afar, bears up in Harwich roadstead, and signals for a pilot. Not long has she to wait for a response. A trim little craft comes dancing over the waves like a white-winged gull, and swings up gaily alongside. In another minute George Cheal has swung himself aboard, and little Jim prepares to put about and return.

But off the deck of that gallant ship it would seem, in good sooth, that the sea has given up her dead; for stalwart George, gazing with startled eye on a face which greets his sight, staggers back and grasps the taffrail for support. Few words pass between the long-parted friends, for their feelings are too deep for utterance; but a moment or two afterward there is a wild scream of delight from alongside for Harry Reed has descended into the boat, mechanically taking the tiller. A little later the boy Jim has unloosed the arms thrown about his old comrade's neck, and scrambling forward strains his eyes toward the harbor which the little craft is now rapidly nearing, and in a very fever of excitement imparts the intelligence that Humphrey and Rachel have come over from Cherbury and are awaiting his return.

Halting of speech, mechanical of action, stony-eyed as one who dreams, Harry Reed sits with his hand on the tiller, asking no questions, hearing nothing beyond the quick throb of his pulses and the surging of the blood in his ears. So the moments pass, and the boat is brought up alongside the harbor steps.

Yet another brief interval, and Harry had fumbled his way mechanically up on the pier; and a moment more and he becomes suddenly conscious of the approach of a woman's figure, of a passionate cry in his ears, and of a half-fainting form in his arms.

"Rachel, Rachel!" groans the strong man in his agony, when his voice at length comes to him, "couldst thou not have remained true to me even this short while?"

Her fingers move over his face, as the fingers of the blind move.

"True Harry?" she murmurs. "Aye, true till death!"

"True?" he cries, casting her from him in a sudden frenzy of passion, "when thou'rt married?"

"Married?" she whispers, gazing helplessly into his face. Then suddenly she comprehends, and begins to laugh hysterically and sob; and he by some subtle intuition, suddenly comprehends also, and straining her to his heart, cries:

"Idiot that I have been! I was blind—blind; but now I see!"

And all this time a gray-haired, weather-beaten coastguardsman has been tacking round and about these two [illegible]

They did not wait long, those lovers, for the last act of their little domestic episode; they thought that, after that parting of theirs, there was no occasion of doing so. It was shortly after daybreak on the first Wednesday of the month of May that they met; and on the following Wednesday, just a little before noon, the bells of Cherbury church rang out a gladsome peal, and Rachel Cheal and Harry Reed, kneeling side by side turned over a fair, fresh page, and as man and wife commenced a new chapter of the great book of their lives.

A Dyspeptic Musing.

Dyspepsia, says the Independent, has sometimes been claimed as the great American disease. A Scotchman generally has a sniffling or a cold; an Irishman a smothering about the heart, and an Englishman, as he increases in red blood is worried about his liver. But your average American is dyspeptic, except that for variety it is now quite common to speak of as a little touch of the malaria. We think that there are some very good reasons why indigestion, in some form or other, is a very common complaint. It has certainly become a characteristic of the nineteenth century, especially in America, to do work in a somewhat hurried way. There is a development of the nervous susceptibility at the expense of those forces which have to do with digestion and assimilation. Not only does this make greater demands upon alimentation, but in itself interferes directly with the process of digestion. This has been tested by feeding persons when under continued excitement, and by comparison of the activity of digestion in two dogs fed precisely the same and killed, the one after three hours of rest, and the other after three hours of violent exercise. Besides, however, this general law, the habit of rapidity finds its most active indulgence at the table. We once had occasion to wait in a large eating-house in New York City to watch the process of eating. It was marvelous to see how many would finish a meal in ten minutes, including baked apple dumplings as a dessert. Even many of those who stayed longer spent so much time in waiting or talking that the act of eating was itself hurried. Nothing that a man does in life should be more deliberate than that of eating. This wonderful mechanism of supply cannot be too carefully studied; how the glands of the mouth are supplied with juices and lubricants so there may not enter into the stomach any drinks at all or any food either so dry or so unmasticated as to be indigestable. If one had no teeth very much would be gained in the eating of soft food by moving it about with the tongue, so as to stir well into those marvelous fluids which the chemistry of nature has provided. Then the teeth of all varieties, shape sizes, with cutting edges, with grinding surfaces, are unequalled by any mills of human construction. The muscles which operate them are used to crack walnuts by many a child who does not use them very much to masticate food. The origin of a great many cases of dyspepsia is just in fact that the mouth as the mixing and grinding place of food is ignored. A well-chewed slice of fresh cucumber is not so indigestable as many may think, but such a slice lodged whole against the mucus membrane of the stomach may stop there a long time and become a source of irritation. If food is well-chewed and thoroughly mixed, the juices and the motions of the stomach seem to take comparatively little heed of its composition. Food thus prepared for a healthy stomach can be of very composite admixture and yet not be indigestible. It is soon so softened and chymified as in little quantities at a time to find its way through the pyloric end of the stomach, ready for the other processes which take place in the upper intestine. When the stomach is irritated, the muscles here often act in a spasmodic manner, and the stirring or peristaltic action is greatly disturbed. The number that have recovered from dyspepsia, where they find out the errors of method they have adopted, is so great as to show that no part of the human system is more inclined to keep right if it only has a chance. The great trouble is that so often ailments which are a direct result of errors in modes of eating or in the materials used are attributed to some other cause. Heart palpitation very often occurs from disturbed digestion. So called liver-complaint is generally a form of mal-assimilation, and it is only by adapting foods to the stomach and upper intestine that, as a rule, we relieve hepatic congestions or derangements. No greater progress has marked medical chemistry and physics than that which concerns the relation of foods to alimentation. The physical trainer has so come to understand it and to apply it directly and successfully in all physical contests. There never has been a time in all the ages when it was so possible to get right food, to secure right preparation of it by cooking and mastication, and to get from it physical forces, mental energy and capacity for all progress. There are some Christians who would greatly develop their graces by bringing their religion to bear upon physical duties, and there are multitudes of others who would improve in duty, comfort and capacity by remembering that indigestion is generally not inherited, but is a positive token of personal blunders.

Convict Marriages in Caledonia.

When it has been decided after due inquiry, that a couple—say A. and B.—may be united, it is sought to excite in each of the parties an interest in the other. A. is told all about the past life of B., and vice-versa; they are also shown each other's photographs. Then if the parties do not object to meet, an appointment is made; and they generally see each other in the parlor of the female prison in the presence of the matron. As to this however, the manner of interviews varies; for the matron and chaplain may arrange matters as they please so that everything be done with propriety. The intended bridegroom is always in possession of a cottage and a plot of land, for he cannot marry until it is proved that he can maintain himself out of the produce of his holding, eked out by the wages he may receive as laborer on public works. Naturally he is not compelled to take the bride whom the authorities have designated for him. If she pleases him at first sight he generally sees her two or three times more before a regular engagement is made. She goes to visit his cottage in company with a nun, or some employment is given her out of doors in laundry or dairy, where she may be seen in comparative freedom. When at last the engagement is concluded, the intended bride goes and spends a few days at the convent of Our Lady of Mercy, held by the Augustine nuns; and it is there that the marriage takes place with the smallest amount of publicity possible. If the parties cannot afford to buy a gold wedding-ring, a silver one it provided for them. After their marriage the convict couple become probationary free colonists under certain conditions; they must dress in brown; they must not enter any establishment where intoxicating liquors are sold; and they must leave their cottage after nightfall without a written permit. These and other restrictions are gradually removed in reward for good conduct, till at last the husband receives a free pardon and becomes the free owner of his piece of land.—Chamber's Journal.

Of the class of thirty-six who recently graduated at Bowdoin college only two propose to enter the ministry.

BALTY—THE MINER.

Balty came with the rest to Hawkins' in '49. Hawkins' has proved Balty's local destiny. For sixteen years he tried to reach Sonora, only twenty miles distant. Chinese Camp lay seven miles away. Chinese proved for Balty an impassible barrier. There Phœnix produced the black bottle; Pike, a cut glass decanter, welcoming drinks for Balty! He always stayed at Chinese. Chinese proved Balty's Delilah. There he was regularly shorn of his dust, his sobriety, his resolutions. Time after time did he leave the river, resolved to be a man, to be strong, to procrastinate the spree he had promised himself until he reached Sonora. Time after time did he fail, retreating back to Hawkins', his buckskin purse depleted of its last grain, and bearing his receipt in full for dust deposited in various exchequers at Chinese, in the shape of two black bottles tied together by a string.

In 1865 there happened to Balty one of those events of a moment which decide and turn a man's whole future career. Coming, as usual, to Chinese from Hawkins' on a hired horse, the animal ran away with him, carrying him past the camp, against which he had so often dashed, and up the road toward Sonora. Balty kept on and accomplished the feat.

It is often thus. We spend an existence in endeavoring to accomplish an aim, to solve a problem, and when at last we give it up, accident takes hold, and in a flash carries us straight to the point. Balty tried for sixteen years to reach Sonora. The man failed. The horse won.

Sonora was benefited. Balty always had dust when he visited camp. Most of it went, sooner or later, into the saloon-keeper's till. True, he purchased some provisions. His verbal order for a winter's supply, once, ran thus; I guess, Jones, you may bring me a sack of flour, ten pounds of pork, ten pounds of tobacco, and a bar'l of whisky."

Phœnix and Pike, saloon-keepers, never in their hearts forgave the man who let to Balty the mustang which carried him beyond the charmed circle of Chinese. He never renewed his allegiance there. It was a clean loss of at least a thousand dollars yearly to the camp.

There seemed a mysterious affinity between this man and gold. He was sure to strike something in his range of the river and bank diggings a rich deposit once in two years. People grew to have faith in Balty's luck, and trusted him by reason of that faith. Balty was lucky; while honest, sober, but penniless Industry stood by and cursed.

Apart from the search for gold, Balty was dull, uninteresting, even stupid. On the trail after a lead, he brightened up. All sense and keenness poured through that channel. The rest were dry. Something led him unerringly to the place in the Flat where lay a "dollar-prospect." Industry and Sobriety sank their shafts through foot and foot of "hard pan" and barren gravel. On the ledge, Industry and Sobriety found a half-a-cent-to-the-pan prospect, "fine-flour gold will cover your pan's bottom with a 'thousand colors'"—so fine that the glass is needed to reveal them; but in weight they are as dust on the butterfly's wing.

There was Crane Flat. For years, the river and bank yielding richly, it had been over-looked. But Balty had ever kept an eye on it. A ragged scrawl on a certain live-oak informed the public that "We, the undersigned, claim this ground, and are going to work the same as soon as we have a chance,

BALTY.
"GOTHAM."

Such a notice was neither legal or definite. It was not desired that it should be. Old settlers like Balty and Gotham, they had a certain feudal right to territory near which they had so long lived.

Miners' law required of them to state how many feet they claimed. That was what Balty and Gotham didn't want to do. Their claim was indefinite. It overshadowed the whole Flat. A stranger might come along and "jump" a portion, but in doing so he would incur a dangerous unpopularity with the whole community. Of the hundreds, yes, thousands, whose rockers crashed and grated the river pebbles in '50 from the Red Mountain to Indian Bar, Balty and Gotham now alone remained.

Miners' law in 1850 gave thirty feet front to the man. Miners' law in 1855 was expanded. It gave one hundred feet front to the man. Miners' law in 1865 was whatever Balty and Gotham chose to make it. In 1850 it concerned thousands, in 1855 hundreds, in 1565 two—Balty and Gotham. Vox populi, et cetera.

Out of the fag-end of the Flat, out of a light, alluvial sand, mixed with irregularly-shaped bowlders, Balty panned a "two-bit prospect." Two sober, hard-working men, living near by, whose lives were patterns of neatness and order; whose cabin was a marvel of man's housekeeping; whose bread was the lightest on the river, but who for years had not been able to strike anything better than a "two-dollar-per-day claim" (Balty, in scorn, called such "grub-and-whiskey diggin's) made him a liberal offer for four hundred feet of this ground. Balty never prospected another pan from that "gouge" in the bank. He was in need of ready cash. He was ever thus. He owned much and indefinite ground above. He accepted the offer. That "gouge" proved the only pay-spot in the claim. Balty's golden instincts always told him not to prospect salable ground too much. Leave well enough alone. When a prospect-hole develops two bits to the pan, leave it in statu quo. Leave it with the biggest berries on the top of the basket, as does the fruit dealer.

Balty accumulated stores of whisky in his cabin. He stayed by it, and pursued an industrious life of inebriation. When Hawkin's Bar—once a lively camp of eighty souls—was reduced to its last house and its two last residents; when the traveler, on some still, hot summer's afternoon, passed through, hearing the ceaseless roar of the river over the riffle, seeing only in imagination the life and excitement of '50, he might then be hailed from the last house by one of the last residents in tones of jovial inebriation. This would be Balty, arrived at the afternoon stage in his cups, when he was desirous of fraternizing with everybody. When the domestic whisky was exhausted, when the Chinese in the vicinity would no longer hospitably offer their tea-bowls of "blandy," Balty, half-crazed with thirst for stimulant, would go home, discipline by degrees his stomach to its natural food, and restore, day by day, the steadiness of his nerves. In a week he was at work. In a few months some overlooked spot on the flat, or bar, some riffle, untouched for years, on which the fine "drift-gold" had been constantly accumulating, "panned out" richly for Balty; and industry and sobriety stood by and cursed.

Balty was the principal owner in the General Scott, a river-bed claim. None save he and Gotham lived near, who, twelve years before, had seen that portion of the bed laid bare. Balty had long waited the chance to work this ground. Year after year had the Franklin Pierce claim, just below, put up their dam, "backing water" over the General Scott riffle. At last the Franklin Pierce was "worked out." The General Scott people could now go in. They [illegible]

At the end of the season, when the river rose, Balty stood upon its banks $5,000 the richer man. Phœnix and Pike, hearing of Balty's luck, again cursed the undisciplined brute which had borne him once and forever beyond the pale of Chinese Camp. Sonora [illegible]. All were disappointed. Balty said he was going east. Everybody [illegible] As soon as Table Mountain slip its moorings and go to San Francisco. But Balty was in earnest. He bought a team of mustangs and a rickety buggy. Gotham opened his eyes. Balty had certain ideas as to the style in which opulence should travel. He dashed around the country for a few days. Every grogery received a new financial impetus. People wondered how soon the team would run away and the buggy become a wreck. They wondered and waited in vain. Balty, after coruscating about Tuolumne for a fortnight, suddenly dashed off at a tangent—gold, mustangs buggy, and all. The establishment was never seen or heard of after. Balty was invisible for two months and two weeks. At the end of that period, Balty dropped down again on Hawkin's bar without a cent, and the two bottles tied together by a string—one full the other empty. Receipts in full. He had been east; he had seen his native city.

It was a miracle that Balty—for eighteen years not able to get farther than twenty miles from Hawkins'—should weather all the temptations of San Francisco and go on board the steamer, with a sound skin and a comparatively sound pulse as he did. But the marvel of the miracle was, that he saved money to buy a return ticket. The miracle was at last partially explained. Balty, in San Francisco had deposited sufficient money to purchase that return ticket. Community had not given him enough credit for forethought. Balty knew he was to squander five thousand dollars east; so he planned not only to keep his communications open with California, but even with Hawkins'. For all the way to Stockton he had paid even the stage-fare, lodging, and meals for the return trip, two months and two weeks in advance.

Beyond the mere fact that Balty had been to the States, the sparse population of the river were not much wiser. He rambled vaguely, at times, about sundry trips between New York and Philadelphia, and a "lady."

Gotham had intrusted him with messages for a mother and brother. Gotham had regarded their proper delivery, being dependent on Balty, in the light of a forlorn hope. But years had passed since any one had gone direct from the river to the States. Balty might make good his promised connections. A few stranger things had happened. Balty promised. Gotham received those promises in silence. He knew Balty could and would promise.

A few months after Gotham received a letter from his brother. "I saw yourr fiend Balty," it read. "He did not seem quite himself."

"It's easy enough to know how it was with Balty," said Gotham, speaking confidentially on the subject. "He met Mac in Philadelphia. Mac, you know, was a 'sport' here in '55. Mac says to himself: 'Here, Balty will rid himself of his cash as fast as he can. If I don't get some of it, some one else will!' And so I guess they worked Balty's lead out as quick as they could, and whizzed him back again to California."

Balty is now working in Doesticks Gulch. He has struck nothing for eighteen months. He knows he must soon. It has been ordained that he shall unearth a certain amount of virgin gold before he dies. Destiny sent him to the Tuolumne River for that purpose. It matters little to him whether the "strikes" be near together or far apart. He was born to develop, not to retain wealth. He fully realizes this. It is that which impels him doggedly, stolidly, to work on. Of what use for him to speculate, or enter on any legitimate business?

Once he struck out and invested in hogs; bought a mother with a large litter; he saw himself, in fancy, a hog-drover, and the whole surrounding county covered with his stock. His hogs brought only trouble; they broke into the miners' cabins, and ate their provisions; bread, baking in Dutch ovens by outdoor fires—the men being at work on their claims—was polluted; infuriated sufferers clamored at Balty's cabin for redress. His hogs disturbed his own rest during the frosty nights; they slept in a pile by his door; inside of that cabin was warm, the outside, cold; the external pile wished to be the internal, the internal wished to remain so. There was the long night, a steady squeal, grunt and struggle. Balty at last became disgusted with the pig business. He sold out; the money was quickly put in circulation; that was Balty's mission. He saw it clearly; he sees it now clearer than ever. He holds that it is not for him to accumulate wealth; he is merely a medium, in the hands of ghostly gold-seekers, to find gold, dig it, and keep up the metalic basis of our currency.

Read This Story, Boys!

"Gentlemen," said a repentant drinking man, at a temperance meeting held in——, during the Murphy excitement, "gentlemen, it has cost me $10,000 to bring my nose to its present state of perfection." $10,000! And what did he have besides his red nose? An aching and remorseful heart, a pain racked and diseased body; a home where a miserable woman probably dragged her weary life along in wretched, hopeless apathy, crushed and bowed to the earth by the shame of being a drunkard's wife. "$10,000!" wrote the recording angel, and turned in stern sorrow from the page. "$10,000!" chuckled the rum seller; "I am that much richer—am I not a lucky man?" "$10,000!" said the devil; "what a fool! I'll have him surely if he doesn't look out." "$10,000," whispered a little boy away back in the corner, whose father was killed in a drunken brawl. $10,000 would have made my mother happy, and I wouldn't have to sell newspapers for a living, and stay out of school when my heart is hungry for books." "$10,000!" soliloquized the young man who drank a little, "I can't afford that," and he signed the pledge, though he did not mean to. The confession was like a spark that flew into the flame, and ran with vivid tongues of fire through the vast audience. The little boy went forward with the throng with all the manliness of 25. He wrote his name as well as he could, and proudly took his pledge card. When he thought himself unnoticed he wrote slyly on its back: "$10,000 saved for mother by not drinking." That was exactly the way he wrote it, so you need not laugh. Maybe his own father had wasted as much over his cups, and his child had no time to learn to spell. He was busy all day at anything to turn an honest penny, and nights, poor little fellow, he was too tired and sleepy to even look at a book.

How do I know what he wrote? In passing out his precious card was brushed from his hand. He could not go back for the throng pressed on.

It was picked up by the janitor, given to one of the officers in charge; was next day posted on an immense blackboard, and served as a text for one of the most magnificent lectures of the course. What a lot of wet handkerchiefs there were when the speaker was through! How red the ladies' eyes were—almost as red as the drunkard's nose! And Jimmy—there, I didn't mean to tell one bit of his name—who had stolen back to get his treasured card, and see if he could sell a few books and papers, trembled like a leaf with excitement, to think he was the hero of all that grand talk, and the color went in and out of his cheeks with just that quiver you have seen in the sky when the northern lights wave and tremble. By and by the gentleman called his name; and somebody put him on the platform, and there was such a stamping and clapping as you never heard [illegible] Why, good people interested themselves in the child and his mother, and Jimmy goes to school now, and his mother is matron in a "temperance house;" and some day, if you don't study hard, boys, Jimmy will be at the top of the ladder while you are just beginning to climb. I want you to remember the man—for he spent $10,000 to bring his nose to its present state of perfection;" and think of the boy, a drunkard's orphan, who resolved to save $10,000 for his mother "by not drinking;" and if you are tempted to drink, see if you can not make and keep a good resolution.

The Rochester relief committee of Cal[illegible] have raised and forwarded $136 cash and two boxes of clothing.

HIS FOLKS.

From the Household.

It was a pleasant room into which the summer wind brought the fragrance of new mown hay and the sweetness of the mignonette which bordered the walks in the shady old-fashioned gardens without.

At the windows, a net-work of morning-glory vines, brilliant with their blossoms of violet, pink and white, shut out the morning sun which; although it was so early in the day, was uncomfortably warm.

Everything was at its best save the feelings of the pretty dark-haired woman who sat by the breakfast table looking so thoroughly miserable, that it would have moved any spectator to mingled pity and curiosity. She had been married but a year and had been very happy until lately. She had, as she said, "notions of her own," among which, one of the most prominent was, that no house was ever yet large enough to accommodate a wife and her husband's mother, and now, not only her husband's mother but a sister too was coming to interfere with all her rules, and find fault with all her arrangements. She had never seen any of her husband's people: at the time of her marriage; his mother and sister were in California with his elder brother's family on account of the sister's health. Now that she was well again they longed for home, and as Harry had the homestead what were they to do but come there?

Letty stormed and resisted, but Harry was firm. She did not deny that she was cross and disagreeable. How could she be any thing else with such a trial in store? How could she be expected to like people who made trouble between Harry and herself even before they came? What it would be afterward she could not bear to think, but she knew that "her good days were done." Why, if they must come to the old home, couldn't she and Harry have a new one? She had nearly had a downright quarrel with her husband on this point.

"Neither mother nor Kate would ever come into the house if it was to drive us out, and it is their home too, as well as ours. Wait till you see them, and don't be so unreasonable."

She should see them soon enough! Only this morning they had received a telegram to the effect that the travelers would arrive that afternoon, and Harry was to meet them at the "junction," some twenty miles distant, so she could not see him again before they came, as he would take an early dinner down town in order to catch the train. It was growing late in the morning, too, and she had not yet washed her breakfast dishes. She supposed she should be all the morning doing them by and by when she had so many to wash, not considering how long she had sat at the breakfast table commiserating herself.

She had gone to the parlor bookcase and found the old photograph album, and taken another look at the faded copy from an old picture which was all Harry had of his mothers while Kate's photograph was just horrid, though Harry did say it did not look the least bit like her; but she got little consolation from the survey. There was one comfort though, she thought as she shut the clasp with a spiteful little snap and put the book down behind a row of art journals, they couldn't look much worse than their pictures, with a little sigh, for for she was an enthusiastic admirer of beauty. Ther didn't look a bit like her handsome Harry, and he—feeling a little hurt at her indifference to his family—had said little about them, rather a cross to the affectionate, generous-hearted young man to whom mother and Kate were almost superhuman.

Mrs. Bryant, her nearest neighbor, had sympathized with Letty from the beginning. "Will brought his mother to live with us when we were married, and I declare I should have died if her youngest daughter had not married and wanted mother to live with her. I told Will all she wanted of her was to do the work, for Maria had always taught school and knew nothing of housekeeping, but I pitied her husband! Wasn't I abused though, in those three years? Mother was a strong, well woman, and yet she had every disease ever known to humanity, and was always complaining; never quite so happy as when she had six or seven kinds of medicine steeping on the kitchen stove and scenting the house all over. You can't stand it Letty, and I wouldn't if I were you. Mrs. Parker says you will never get along with them and I should let Harry know it in the beginning."

So it had gone from bad to worse, Letty listening to the history of the dreadful trials with "his folks" which had been the experience of her acquaintances, and was dealt out to her by unsparing tongues, and daily grew more and more opposed to the double infliction which threatened her.

The day wore on, and although she was anything but reconciled to existing circumstances, still she was too good a housekeeper to allow any one to find her house or table lacking in any particular, and when at five o'clock she heard the whistle of the approaching train and knew they would soon be here, she gave a hasty glance at the reflection of the pretty, dark face and soft muslin dress which met her in the mirror, and passed into the dining room to give some finishing touches to the inviting table which looked as though it needed nothing.

Half an hour afterwards she stood in the hall to welcome the dreaded guests. Was this the invalid old maid who rushed up the steps and caught her in her arms before Harry had time to lift mother down. This tall, handsome girl, with Harry's fair hair and brown eyes who looked no older than she, and who gave her the demonstrative greeting of a school girl. And then she was in mother's arms, and one of the sweetest voices she ever heard called her "daughter," and she burst into a passion of tears, and Harry, man-like, went out and shut the door, muttering something about "helping Tom with the trunks," but with a feeling of peace and happiness he had not known for a long time.

When they were all collected a little, and were sitting around the little supper table, Kate asked, "What did you think we were going to look like? I've laughed till I cried, and mother has too, over the photographs Harry has of us. We would not send him any others—I wouldn't mother wanted to send some, but those were such horrid things I thought it was best to be on the safe side, and sure of looking as well as we were expected to, though I never take well."

Harry laughed. "If you could have seen Letty's face when I told her you looked very much like me, you would have been amused. I told her repeatedly, but she wouldn't believe it. She thought I was in the habit of a brotherly delusion."

Letty said but little. In her impulsive way she had gone as far as to the other extreme, and gazed with delight at Kate's lovely face and mother's, scarcely less lovely, with its soft brown eyes and wavy silvery hair.

The days sped like a pleasant dream. The old fancy work and the old music which had lain idle so long came out of the closet to which it had been banished, and made the little parlor cozy and pleasant. Letty and Kate practiced duets and songs together, Kate having a rich contralto voice which harmonized well with Letty's sweet, though rather weak soprano.

The housework was as nothing with three to do it. The washing and ironing was given to a woman whom Letty at first employed, but whom she dismissed because Mrs. Bryant did her own washing and advised Letty to do the same or "his folks" would think her extravagant. But mother was indignant until she found that Harry knew nothing of the change, and then she talked to Letty about it, and the result was that much of the other work was given up too.

"You can afford it," she said, "and then there are those who depend upon such work for a living, and it is not right to withhold it from them. Then, too, my dear, I should hire all my plain sewing done. There are plenty of steps for you to take, plenty of little things to do if you employ all the help you can in these things. My idea is that we should give ourselves every chance to keep well and strong, and able to enjoy the many things given us to enjoy."

So Letty listened amazed, and followed the sensible advice, which after the first feeling of intrusion was passed, was freely given and as freely asked.

Mrs. Bryant and the other neighbors looked on in astonishment. "They couldn't see how she did it, nor how they all got on so comfortably. She was opposed enough to it in the beginning." But what was said outside troubled our family very little.

One evening when Harry was detained in town by some business, Letty confessed to her two listeners how she had dreaded to have them come, and how she had been talked to about mothers-in-law in general, and then Kate laughing, told her how she too had detested her when she thought how her pet brother, for whom she had always promised to keep house, had given her place to some one dearer.

"But when I saw that anxious look on your face when we drove up to the gate that night, it all came back to me, what mother had always said, "She probably feels as sensitive about meeting you," and I felt as if I couldn't love you enough. Now I would not have Harry single again for anything, would you, Letty?" with a mischievous smile, and Letty was fain to confess that she would have nothing changed.

Marriage in the Fifteenth Century.

How were young ladies dealt with and how were marriages managed in the fifteenth century? If this generation of young ladies have any notion of it, they will rejoice that they were not born to be married four hundred years ago. They know very well if they have attended to their duty and trained up their parents in the way that they should go, they may choose for themselves, with or without discrimination, as the case may be. Neither they nor their parents may have taken the view which I recollect to have heard from Mr. Rogers that it does not much signify who one marries, as one is sure to find next morning that it was somebody else; but though they may not be prepared to go quite this length, yet, from one cause or another, the young, in their willfulness and strength will not seldom act, and the old in their impotence concede, in such sort that they might seem not to stop far short of it. It was otherwise in the last century. Parental rigor in those days could hold its own as firmly as the parish stocks; and there was but one escape—the flight to Gretna Green, a sanctuary known now only to history. The coolness with which it was sometimes resorted to may be exemplified by a quotation (given to me by a grandson of the parties) from a letter written, not, however, to the parents of the lady (for she was an orphan), but to her guardians, beginning thus: "Gentlemen—Your unnatural behavior to your ward, Miss——, induced her, however reluctantly, to take a journey to Scotland, in which she allowed me the honer of accompanying her."

The slackening of restraint in this century may have better results on the whole than the "unnatural behavior" of the last, but it sometimes leads to impromptu arrangements by young people which may seem not to have been made with a sufficient sense of their seriousness. I have known of a proposal in this century by a young gentleman to a still younger lady who gave this ready reply: "Oh, yes, let us be married. It will be such awful fun!" I trust that her somewhat sudden and sanguine expectations were fulfilled. I have no reason to think that they were not. But there is something to be said for taking time on such occasions, and looking before and after.

A Teacher's Answers.

President Wayland, of Brown University, was a great teacher. He had the rare art of drawing out a pupil's mind. He did little work for him, but he did make him work for himself.

In the recitation room, it was clearly understood that the subject of the lesson was one in which students and professors were equally interested. They were encouraged to ask questions, and to express their conscientious dissent from the views of their teacher.

Occasionally a student would abuse this freedom; but a sharp answer, such as showed the folly of the foolish youth, prevented the renewal of the experiment.

"Do you consider dancing wrong?" asked a student.

"Not much time for that sort of thing in this world, my son. The next," was the reply.

Once, when the subject was the trustworthiness of human testimony and its sufficiency to establish miracles, a skeptical student asked,—

"What would you say Dr. Wayland, if I stated that, as I was coming up College Street, I saw the lamp-post at the corner dance?"

"I should ask you where you had been, my son?" was the effective reply.

On another occasion, while the class was studying the evidences of Christianity, a brilliant young skeptic thought he would have a tilt with the doctor.

"I have never," he said, "been able to discover any internal evidence that the Old Testament was inspired. For instance, doctor, take the book of Proverbs. It needed no inspiration to write that. I have often thought that I could write as good proverbs myself."

"Very well, my son, perhaps you can," quietly answered the doctor. "Suppose you prepare a few and read them to the class to-morrow. The next."

The uninspired proverbs were never read.

A Dog's Trip Over Niagara Falls.

From the Niagara Falls Gazette.

Mr. Chorman, wishing to get rid of a barking dog, dropped him from Goat Island bridge last Sunday morning. Bidding doggy good-bye as he floated down the rapids he returned home. But doggy would not have it that way. During the afternoon a stranger walking across the new suspension bridge observed a dog under the bank and notified the gate keeper at the American end of the bridge, who, with a glass recognized the dog. [illegible] Mr. Chorman that his dog was below the bank. Later in the day Mr. Chorman went down the inclined railroad, but could not [illegible] the dog, who seemed [illegible] what had happened. All at once the dog has become the hero of the hour and will now be allowed to remain and live out the full measure of his days.

AS LIMNED BY LEANDER.

A Friendly Sketch of Clubber Williams, Wherein He Is Shown Not to be So Black as He Has Been Painted.

The Sickening Smudge Raised by Frank Bangs' Desire to Back Out of His Bad Matrimonial Bargain.

Lovely Mollie's Impressions of London Theatricals—Also Gotham Stage Gossip and a Lot of Friendly Tips.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Aug. 23.—Every now and then I pick up a paper containing some sort of an attack on Capt. Williams—"Clubber" Williams, these enemies of his delight to call him. It always makes me indignant, not that I have any particular aversion to seeing people prodded up a little, journalistically, now and then—for I haven't. This shows that appearances are deceiving, because nobody would dream that I liked to see folks hauled over the coals now and then. But this attack on Capt. Williams is played out. It has made him celebrated in New York, and, indeed, pretty much all over the country. To a sensitive man that kind of celebrity wouldn't be very welcome, perhaps. But Williams is one of those chaps who are moved by the sublime spirit of don't-care-a-cuss; and the more he is sailed into, the less it worries him. He is universally held up to the public gaze as a ruffian of the deepest dye, always going around with the trunk of a tree in his hand, looking for somebody to thump over the head with it. In reality he is—well, I'll tell you about him. A few years ago James Gordon Bennett, full of animal spirits, and alcoholic spirits as well, was going down Broadway about 4 o'clock one morning in a carriage. The horses were running at the top of their speed, and Bennett was yelling at the apex of his voice. You have probably heard of men doing such things in mining camps, but you probably share the popular prejudice against introducing similar customs into civilized life. Well, Capt. Williams, then an unknown officer, heard the racket and stopped the horses. Bennett pushed his red face out of the window, and when the captain told him to go quietly home like a respectable citizen, he swore and shouted that he would do just as he pleased. Capt. Williams said he guessed not, and Bennett replied that he was the owner of the Herald and wouldn't be dictated to. Williams said he didn't give a darn who he was; he must go home or to the station house. There was a brief fight, and James Gordon Bennett, limp as a rag from one of the best thrashings ever administered to anybody, spent the night in a cell. He swore he would "break" Capt. Williams, and with the help of the Sun he began his crusade. Williams had the worst work in New York to do, and whenever there was a riot his men would always be found in the front row. Consequently, if anybody got hurt, the Herald and Sun were mighty careful to give Williams the credit of having done the clubbing. After a while they got to crowding Williams pretty hard, and one day he retained as his counsel a notorious lawyer who was on the staff of the Sun. It is an odd coincidence that the journalistic luminary immediately ceased to attack Capt. Williams. About this time he was transferred to the street department, as a compromise, and the Herald let up on him, too. He remained in the street department one year. Meanwhile his precinct, which is the worst in New York, was placed in the hands of another captain, and the roughs ran wild all over it. It soon became evident that there was only one man on the force who was capable of managing that section of the city. It was a pandemonium during the whole year of Williams' absence. The authorities were glad enough to put him back, and you may be sure that all the newspapers in New York couldn't root him out again. He has a theory that, to manage criminals, they ought to be bunched as much as possible. So he has not discouraged certain classes from settling within his own reach. He knows they can't be stamped out altogether, and he would rather be able to lay hands on them when they are wanted, than to have them diffused through the whole city. He is a big, fine-looking man, as strong as an ox, and as full of courage as the pluckiest man that ever walked. He is never off duty, but always strolling about in citizen's clothes, keeping a sharp eye on things in his precinct. His men are the best disciplined of any in New York, and they think him a sort of demi-god. As for clubbing nonsense! When a man can strike a blow with his fist that is like the kick of a multicharge mule, what's the use of a club? Williams is the best officer in New York, and there isn't an unmanly item in his make-up. He has affronted Bennett again while in the pursuit of duty since returning to his post. This I know. But Bennett hadn't the nerve to go after him again. Men who are steadily abused in the newspapers usually have good points. Williams fairly bristles with them.

REGARDING THE REGATTA.

What do you think of Hanlan and his corps of fellow hippodromers? You will probably reply by asking me what I think. Well, I think they are a precious tart crowd. Courtney will, of course, get a good deal of blame for not having won the trial heat at Watkins, so as to get a chance to row Hanlan in the final heat. Well, when a man has got a bad name, it is pretty hard for him to find people willing to credit him with a single decent impulse. I haven't the slightest doubt that Courtney is as crooked as any of the other oarsmen. The fact is that there is not an honest professional sculler in the United States. But the fact remains that Mr. Lee and Mr. Ross, who are openly members of the Hanlan combination of hippodromers, put up a scheme at Watkins to prevent Courtney from getting a place in the first heat. Lee rowed over into Courtney's water with the deliberate intention of heading him off, so that his confederate could step in for first place without a struggle. No matter what Courtney is in the scale of honesty, it was a dirty trick; and I adhere to my belief, which, I have no doubt, is shared in secret by all first-class scullers, that Courtney can pull a boat all around Hanlan, if he gets a chance, and is willing to pull for all he is worth. And, while I am on this subject, let me reiterate the statement which I originally made in the columns of the ST. PAUL PIONEER PRESS, that Mr. Courtney's boat at Chautauqua was sawed by his own backer, as the only means of keeping him from completely upsetting the calculations of the betting swindlers who were "in the ring." The statement seems to have set a good many people talking on the matter who don't know very much about it. But this original story is the true one, just the same.

THE BANGS BUSINESS.

The Bangs scandal seems to be about as lively a record of matrimonial woes as I have ever come in contact with. Upon my word, the dramatic profession does turn out some of the most disgusting marital revelations it is possible for the most imaginative disseminators of scandal to conceive. It is a hard matter for enthusiasts to defend a profession which is absolutely rotten to the core. Scarcely a month passes without some nasty revelation of the stage, and those of us who are on the inside, so to speak, know there are scores of tales every year which do not see the light at all. It is useless to contend that these things occur with equal frequency in the private walks of life. They do nothing of the kind. There is no other profession on earth so productive of family trouble. It is with regret that one must admit this to be the truth, particularly where one sees at the same time the fascinations of the stage, and has defended the calling vigorously for many years. But facts are facts, and there are so many dirty ones about the theater that it is useless to dodge the issue. This Bangs difficulty is a wretched thing. I feel sorry for the husband, because I have known him long as one of the most gentle and polished and self-respecting of men. The fact remains against him that he took this woman's money, whether at her solicitation or not is of no consequence. He accepted it, and that is enough. She seems to have imagined that having bought him, she owned him, body and soul. You know her, of course. She is a daughter of the late Isaac Singer, though there is nothing remarkable in that. Singer had daughters and wives galore. He left this one a large income, ranging from $20,000 to $60,000 a year, according to the imagination of the one who tells the story. She wanted to be an actress, and with the actresses stand. She tried it on, and made an awful fizzle of it. She had a voice like a tin whistle, a chest like a pancake and an abdomen like a balloon. Under these circumstances it was not wonderful that people displayed no wild anxiety to go and look at her. After quitting the stage, she fell in love with Frank Bangs, and began her acquaintance with him by writing him "mash" letters. He accepted her attentions and her money, and they were married. Then, after living together a week, they parted. His charges against her are mysterious; her's against him are trivial. The fact is, that her first husband only stood her for a week, so the record is against her. In a public interview, describing how he stayed away from her, she says: "The next morning the hotel proprietor telegraphed me that he was ill with cholera morbus. Then he came home and kissed me, and had the cholera morbus again." Well, I don't blame him; I should have thought he might have had the delirium tremens. The whole thing is disgusting and disgraceful, even as a stage scandal.

The cold weather has come on unusually early this year, and the watering places around here are in mourning. Long Branch, Coney Island, Newport and Rockaway are almost deserted. The people have been flying for home through two solid weeks, now, and New York is again full of its regular residents. The hotel keepers say they will end the season three weeks earlier than usual, and at an immense loss. It is an expensive matter to run a seaside hotel, and it doesn't take a very long period of bad business to knock the profits galley west. At Coney Island the best hotels are letting rooms for whatever they can get, and that isn't much. There are few people, aside from those financially interested in the place, who are sorry to know this. Coney Island is a glittering sham. It is a worse place for extortion and robbery than Niagara itself. One has to pay double price for inferior accommodations, and beyond this there is enough malaria in the place to give the chills and fever to a graven image. Much of the time the water is not fit to bathe in, by reason of the garbage that has floated ashore from the dumping scows, and there is everywhere a shoddy, veneered atmosphere that is not enjoyed by people in their normal senses. For a few seasons Coney Island has been the fashion. But people have come to see through it now, and the place has had its day. It was the paradise of sharpers of both sexes, but this won't be so any more. Hence let us rejoice, my brethren, and be exceedingly glad.

A LETTER FROM MARY.

A friend of mine had a letter from Mary Anderson the other day. Mary is in London, and I suppose she won't like my giving this thing away. However, here goes, and this is what she says: "I have been enjoying myself pretty steadily. You know I like to go to theaters above everything else, and now that I have nothing else to do I have been making the most of the opportunity. The London theaters do not leave our own playhouses out of sight, by any means. The Savoy and the Haymarket are very handsome edifices, but they are not handsomer than the Madison Square, Casino, Grand Opera house, or Fifth Avenue. The average of the acting is pretty good, but no better than what we see in America. Mr. Irving and Mr. Bancroft produce their plays more evenly well than any other managers over here. Mr. Irving is a matchless stage manager. As an actor, you will be the best judges when he comes over. To me, in spite of stronger and more striking mannerisms than I ever saw in any other actor, there is a great charm in his work. He understands every point, and he knows just how to make everything tell. He will make a great excitement in America, and will divide the critics widely. In regard to my own engagement in London, it certainly looks well—so well that I am very little concerned about the result. It is wrong to suppose there is a prejudice in England against American artists. The prejudice is all the other way. Everywhere I have been received with marked courtesy and kindness. All these compliments would have turned my head, only that it is pretty well fastened on by this time. Mr. Abbey has engaged Mr. J. H. Barnes to support me. You have already seen him in America. He is a tall, handsome man and a good actor. Several members of the company are Americans. I mean to work hard and seriously, and I really think the chances of success are with me. Good by. I am homesick already, and would give a good deal to be in New York just for a day."

It has come to be a fact in theatrical matters hereabouts that two or three managers have cornered pretty much all the stock talent in America. Between Stetson and the Madison Square, there are not many players left who who are worth speaking about. Stetson has on his list for the coming season, Charles Coghlan, James O'Neill, Frederick de Belleville, Herbert Kelcy, Harry Dixey, Agnes Booth, Florence Gerard, Jeffreys-Lewis, and a lot more of well-known people. His salary list, for only those I have named, amounts to $2,400 a week, and in its entirety, when all his other actors come to be reckoned up, will go to pretty nearly $5,000 a week. The rent of his two theaters comes to $1,250 weekly during the season, and his railroad fares and advertising about $500 more. All in all, Stetson will have to take $7,000 a week for his share all around, in order to come out whole. You see a man can lose big money in a theater, if he only tries. The Madison Square people have engaged for next year Frederick Bryton, George Clarke, J. G. Grahame, Charles Wheatleigh, Walden Ramsey, Thomas Whiffen, Dominick Murray, Joseph Wheelock, Benjamin Maginley, May Freeman, Georgia Cayvan, Ada Dyas, Carrie Turner, Clara Walters, Estelle Clayton, Enid Leslie, and a raft of others, literally too numerous to mention. They have five new plays ready for production, but, in spite of previous intentions, they won't touch any of them for the immediate future, because The Rajah has make too big a hit to allow of its being shelved thus early. It is settled that Fred Marsden's Elsie Deane will not follow The Rajah, and the managers have paid forfeit to the author, though they retain his play. One of the other four pieces will be chosen—which one is not yet settled.

FRIENDLY TIPS.

Olive Logan smokes a pipe and hears with an ear trumpet.

Jennie June is slender and weak-eyed, and no longer youthful. She has a contract with her husband, providing that each of them shall furnish half the household expenses. But she does most the work, just the same. He isn't of much account.

The game of billiards is going out of fashion, and baccarat is coming in. The old game was preferable to the new one, but didn't eat up money so rapidly. No luck can beat baccarat steadily.

Lorillard, the millionaire, lost $2,000 on a bet about one day's run of the Brittannic, a couple of weeks ago. He says John L. Raymond, who won the money, was in collusion with the captain. Sam'l of Curtis Posen was also taken in to the tune of $1,800, and stoutly iterates the collusion story. This looks pretty badly for Capt. Perry and Fresh, the American.

Mr. O'Wilde is the newest appellation for the British æsthete. About this time, after reading the criticisms on Vera, Oscar is sadly murmuring, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a play." And his enemy is thinking gently to himself, "I'm no such d—d fool."

Edwin Booth has had his hair cut, too. He looks more civilized, but less poetic. I don't know why long hair is considered a sign of poesy, but it is. A bald-headed man could never be laureate in the world.

At last Tilden is out, flat-footed, as a candidate. It is another case of "swearing she would ne'er consent, consented." Uncle Sammy is driving a pair of Kentuck trotters, and otherwise affecting sporting habits calculated to let folks see how lively and muscular he is. Nobody will have any confidence in him, however, till he spars with Sullivan.

Minnie Palmer won't be home from Europe for a year. She has made a great hit over there, and Johnny Rogers is tickled almost to death. They have played to an average of $6,000 a week thus far—which is simply enormous, for the old country.

Roscoe Conkling for president! You can begin to make up your mind that when the Republican convention opens he will be the strongest man before it. He has more followers than any man in the country to-day, and he will knock Blaine out in one round.

LEANDER RICHARDSON.

VALE.

Stars of the solemn night tremble and quiver,
Shadows of evening fall soft o'er the river,
Winds from the northland, with moaning and shiver,
Beat through the boughs of the shuddering trees.
Here where our hearts knew the rapture of meeting,
Hand-clasp and heart-throb and fonds words of greeting,
Here where we recked not the happy hours fleeting,
Dirges of sorrow are borne on the breeze.

Faithfulest friend in life's moments of gladness,
Teacher, inspirer in seasons of sadness,
When o'er my soul stole despair's haunting madness,
Rang thy true words to all doubting a knell.
Lonely I walk by the dim flowing river;
Love's happy dream will return to me never;
Bitter the fate that our fond hearts could sever;
Tenderest, bravest, farewell, oh, farewell!

YACHTS OF BOSTON TOWN.

Giving a List of the Fine Craft in Which the Wealthy Hubbites Take Their Summer Airing.

The Life and Adventures of the Famous America, the Speedy Boat of Commodore Ben.

BOSTON, Mass., Special Correspondence, Aug. 22.—Yachting is one of the most popular ways in which wealthy Bostonians seek health and pleasure at this season of the year, many of them owning speedy crafts worth thousands of dollars, on which they spend a large portion of their time, cruising here and there, visiting the fashionable watering resorts along the New England coast, contesting for honors and prizes with white-winged rivals in regattas, or enjoying themselves upon the wave in other different ways. These yachts are invariably elegantly fitted up, and everything that can add to the comfort and pleasure of the owner is provided, making them floating palaces, on which one can live contentedly week in and week out, or for an entire summer. With the possible exception of New York, Boston is the greatest yachting rendezvous of this country, having nearly as many yachts as the first named place, and supporting a dozen or so clubs. Her boats are not so large as those of New York, but are as fast if not a bit faster, taken on the average, and are as costly in proportion. Several millions of dollars are invested in yachts in Boston harbor and vicinity, and each year the amount is increased in proportion as the miniature vessels multiply. The list includes crafts ranging in length from fifteen feet to nearly 150 feet, and in style from cat rig to steam yacht. The Dreadnaught, probably, is the most valuable yacht in these waters, although the finely constructed schooner Gitana comes quite close to her in cost. Both are owned by Boston millionaires, the former by Mr. A. W. Nickerson, and the latter by Mr. William Weld. The Dreadnaught measures a few inches over 130 feet in length, has a twenty-four-foot five-inch beam, and in full sailing condition is worth a round $100,000. The Gitana is only 109 feet in length, but is undoubtedly the staunchest and best built boat to be found hereabouts. Money was not spared by the owner in building and fitting her out, and she has cost him probably $80,000. Next come three yachts which together are worth about $150,000, or $50,000 apiece. These are the Vidette, Fortuna and Ben Butler's famous yacht America. The owners of these magnificent boats own several million dollars each, and can afford to indulge in such luxuries. The Vidette is a steam yacht 123 feet 4 inches long, with only an 18-foot beam, is quite fast, and belongs to Mr. W. B. Bliss, of the Boston & Albany railroad. The Fortuna is owned by Commodore H. S. Hovey, and is newly built. Among the $20,000-yachts might be named the Tarolinta and the Barracoda. The Tarolinta is one of the handsomest and trimmest crafts in the entire fleet, and is 105 feet 6 inches long. She was built in 1878 at Newburg, N. Y., and in 1882 was thoroughly overhauled at great cost. She has ten staterooms, fitted up gorgeously, and is very fast, being able to do sixteen miles an hour. Until quite recently she was owned by Mr. Bliss, but has been sold to Boston pilots. The Barracoda is comparatively new, and belongs to Mr. Harry Dutton of this city. She was built in Rhode Island in 1880, and has very powerful machinery. She is but 72 feet long, however, and is schooner rigged. The schooner Fleur-de-Lis and Adrienne are the best of the $10,000 yachts. The former is remarkably swift, and was built on a fine model by Van Deursen of New York. She is 84 feet long and spreads 2,000 feet of canvas. She is noted for being able to stand up under heavy wind, holding full sail, when the other boats have to double reef. She is quite roomy and sumptuously furnished. To illustrate how money is spent upon these yachts, it may be stated that every piece of the table service of the Fleur-de-Lis is hand painted with a yachting scene, no two being alike. The table linen and other furnishings are beautifully embroidered, while the stationery bears hand-painted crests. The Adrienne is also a fast boat, and is owned by Mr. Edward Harding, who has just purchased her. There are a large number of $5,000 yachts, the most noted being the Letha. Vision, Marion D., Wivern and Vanitas, all good staunch crafts.

COMMODORE BEN.

One of the jolliest yachting parties now afloat is on board Ben Butler's boat America. The hero of Tewksbury has made a break for purer air than that which blows across the almshouse field to the State house, and with a number of congenial spirits is cruising in his "yot" along the coast in the direction of Maine. The commodore is quite as much at home with the helm of the America in his hand as with the helm of State, and is a little more successful in its management, if anything. It has been remarked that it is a study for a painter when Ben stands at the stern, wheel in hand in a sailor's attitude, his corpulent form in garb of blue, the gentle zephyrs toying with his scanty, iron-gray locks, and his celebrated weather eye cocked seaward. Benjamin has a happy time on his yachting cruises, forgetting even his presidential aspirations in the enjoyment of the occasion. When one of his guests inquires: "What are the wild waves saying, Benny?" it is alleged that his reply is: "Have a drink," and forthwith both adjourn and "seek the seclusion that the cabin grants," and imbibe to the health of "his sisters and his cousins and his aunts." Ben, so they say, "is just h—l on cocktails," and can walk way round the best barkeeper in the land in mixing them. But the "old man," as he is affectionately called at the State house, has a yacht in the America well worth being proud of. She is the fastest boat of her size and rig in the world, having won first prizes in contests in home and foreign waters. The history of the America is a most interesting one. She was built in the fall and winter of 1849 in New York by the well-known naval architect, Mr. George Steers, and was launched in the spring of 1850. Her dimensions then were as follows: Length over all, 100 feet; on water line, 90 feet 4 inches; beam, 22 feet 6 inches; draught, 11 feet 7 inches. In 1851 the America made a trip across the Atlantic, and in August of that year won the Queen's Cup at Cowes. Shortly afterward she raced with the English schooner Titania, then the fastest yacht in British waters, for a purse of £1,000, and beat her. She was then sold to an English nobleman, and her rig changed. This undoubtedly reduced her speed, and she did but little in the racing line for several seasons. She was laid up for two or three years, and in 1860 was purchased by a celebrated Thames boat builder for a comparatively small sum. He replanked and retimbered her with teak wood, but did not alter her model. In 1861 a confederate agent in London, looking after fast vessels to run the blockade of Southern ports, bought her and sent her to Nassau, near Providence. There she was thoroughly fitted out for a blockade runner, and made four successful trips with valuable cargoes. On her fifth trip she was chased by a federal gunboat and run into a bayou on the St. John's river, Florida, where the rebels, finding that they could not escape, scuttled her. She remained under water four months, when she was raised by the United States government and taken to Key West, where she was thoroughly refitted and used as a tender to the Atlantic squadron. At the close of the war she was taken to Newport by Com. Porter, a new set of spars were put into her, she received a new set of sails and new rigging, and her bottom was sheathed with yellow metal. She was then entered for a race from Staten Island light to Sandy Hook lightship and return, and out of a fleet of thirty yachts came in third. On that occasion she was sailed by Capt. Harry Brown and naval officers, with a crew from a man-of-war. Capt. Brown afterwards said that if Commodore Porter, who was on board, had allowed him to carry on all sail, the America would have beat the fleet. She was furnished with a suit of navy canvas, and nothing but the lower sails were used. Had she racing sails and a yachting crew, she would undoubtedly have been the winner. After this race she was sent to Annapolis and used as a practice boat for the midshipmen in the naval academy at that place up to 1874, when she was bought by Gen. Butler for the extremely low price of $5,000, it is said. She were then taken to Gloucester, Mass., overhauled and used for a pleasure boat until the next year, when she was entered for the famous Isle of Shoals regatta. Among her competitors was Rufus Hatch's fast yacht, the Resolute, the Rambler, Halcyon, Foam, Fearless, Coming, and other speedy crafts. The race was over a 38 mile triangular course, with flagboats at each corner of the triangle.

A CRAFTY DODGE.

The night before the day of the race the America put back into Gloucester, and Capt. Jim Read, the skipper, went ashore. In a short time he picked up a fine crew of practical and experienced sailors from the fishing vessels in port, and put them on board the America, sending his regular crew ashore. Arrangements were also made by which the flagboat or buoy marking the turning point of the course on its longest leg, was carried away out to sea and moored. The race was started, the America and Resolute fighting for first place. When they came up to the place where the flag-boat should have been the America, then in the lead, came about and stood in for the judges' boat. The Resolute and some of the other yachts kept in search of the flag-boat, while the crafty Ben and his Cape Ann crew laughed in their sleeves. The America won, of course, but the prize was not awarded. Rufus Hatch was dissatisfied and disgusted at the way the America had won and challenged Butler to race him again over the same distance. Butler was agreeable, and two match races were sailed between the Resolute and the America, the latter winning both; one being awarded on time allowance, and the other on actual time. During the winter of 1876 the America received a complete overhauling, a new deck, new wales and setting the masts plumb instead of the old style of raking masts, being the principal alterations. In the summer of that year she proceeded to New York, intending to compete for the Queen's cup, won by herself twenty-four years previous, but upon her arrival she was barred out, as she did not belong to the New York Yacht club. She went over the course, however, showing the other yachts the way, and came in considerably ahead. The America next sailed for the Centennial prize and silver service, the course being from Sandy Hook lightship to Cape May lightship and return, a distance of 240 miles. This she won quite handily, but only secured the Centennial prize. After this Gen. Butler issued a challenge to sail any yacht in the New York squadron twenty miles to windward and back, but this challenge was never accepted, although the America laid in New York harbor for three weeks awaiting an answer. In August, 1876, she sailed for the Bennett Challenge cup from Sandy Hook lightship to Benton's reef lightship, off Newport, and back, a distance of 228 miles. In this race she suffered a mishap, her headgear being carried away while between Shinnecock and Fire island, at a time when she was only led by one boat. Owing to this accident she lost the race. The same year, when the yacht Countess of Dufferin came from Canada to sail the Madeline, of the New York squadron, the America met the two boats outside Sandy Hook and beat the Madeline, the winner of the match, by four minutes and forty-two seconds, although she had only her sailing crew aboard, and also carried a pleasure party of ladies and gentlemen. The America then came back to this port and her spars and sails were reduced for cruising, as Gen. Butler proposed to cruise among the West India islands. This trip was postponed until several years later. In November, 1880, improvements costing $10,000 were made upon her. She was entirely replanked two streaks below the water line, her length increased six and a half feet aft, and two feet forward, the old lines being retained, and various other changes were made. The America is now 108 feet long over all, and 96 feet on the water line, 22 feet 8 inches beam, has a draught of 11 feet 6 inches, and is ninety tons measurement. The main mast is 78 feet in height. There are five large commodious staterooms, and four large open berths in the after cabin, beside ten berths in the forecastle for the crew. She is built of oak and hackmatack and planked with teak, beside being copper fastened and diagonally braced with iron. Of late years the America has not sailed in regattas or made matches, Gov. Butler using her for a pleasure boat exclusively.

A BLIND YACHT BUILDER.

Probably the fastest steam yacht in the world of her size, and undoubtedly the fastest in American waters, has just been sold to Mr. Mark Hopkins, the California millionaire, now of St. Clair, Mich., and she is now upon the way to her destination. This yatch bears the enigmatical name of No. 100, and is exchanged for $10,000 and the steam yacht Permelia, which cost Mr. Hopkins $28,500. The No. 100 was built by the Messrs. Herreshoff of Bristol, R. I., who have the reputation of constructing some of the fastest small craft afloat. The yacht was designed for the purpose of testing certain ideas in the way of marine steam engines that her builders had recently conceived, and is 100 feet in length, with a breadth of 12½ feet, and has made over nineteen knots an hour, or about twenty miles. The No. 100 is a fine-looking craft, and is admirably adapted for yachting purposes having a compact steam engine and boiler occupying but a small part of her hold, while every inch of the remaining room is utilized for the cabin, gallery and forecastle. The most remarkable thing in connection with this yacht is that her designer and builder is a man who has been totally blind for over thirty years, and has, in spite of this misfortune, developed an ability in work of this kind which ranks him at the head of his profession. This blind genius is Mr. John Herreshoff, the head of the firm. The models of the vessels designed by him are prepared by well-approved mathematical calculations, worked out mentally but after the model is made he goes over it carefully, detecting instantly all defects by his keen sense of feeling. The ability of this wonderful blind genius is not confined to the work of constructing hulls. He has taken a large share in the improvements made by the firm in the ordinary marine engine. Some time ago the Herreshoffs turned their attention to the construction of improved boilers, and the blind brother succeeded in inventing the coil boilers with which their vessels are fitted out. These boilers have the merit of not only developing power in an astonishingly short time, but also of reducing to a minimum the possibility of disaster by explosion. The No. 100 is provided with one of these boilers. The engine has at the cylinder what is termed the "annular valve," an invention of the blind genius, and a device which has no counterpart in the world. Mr. Herreshoff has contracted to build a small steamer that will do twenty-two knots an hour, and hopes shortly to turn out a craft that will steam at the rate of twenty-five knots an hour. Yachts and yachting will grow in size, speed and popularity every year.

Bob Ingersoll's Little Farm.

New Orleans Special: Consequent upon the publication of the fact that subsequent to the resignation of Land Register Richardson, and previous to his vacating his office, he caused the so-called McEnery land scrip to be placed upon some forty-three-odd acres of public lands, Gov. Samuel McEnery to-day issued an order to Attorney Gen. Egan to institute proceedings to annul the entries. They are, according to the attorney general's written opinion, all illegal. Some 15,000 acres of this land are entered in the name of Robert G. Ingersoll, who was Gov. John McEnery's Washington partner. There will be some rare developments in the trial of the case.

SIR GALAHAD.

It was known to all that Sir Galahad was bravest and best of all the knights that graced the table round, and he only saw the Holy Grail.—Mort d' Arthur.

They say he died in olden time,
Crowned with immortal glory:
Hearts have sighed, and eyes been wet
Above this old, sweet story.

For me still lives Sir Galahad;
I see him plain and common,
Sit at his desk and wield his pen,
Only a modern human.

For me he wears a wreath of bay,
No other eyes behold it;
He does not know that day by day
Sweet angel hands unfold it.

Each hour thus given to patient toil,
When given for human loving,
Takes from man's soul a stain or soil,
'Neath heavenly eyes approving.

He walk's life's bath with other men,
Unconscious of the splendor
That's shed about his mighty soul
In radiance warm and tender.

My heart springs forth to meet his own,
Not in your modern fashion,
But shrouded in the griefs I've known,
With naught of mortal passion.

I only know my Galahad
Has seen the Holy Grail,
And, looking in his patient eyes,
How can my courage fail?

ST. LOUIS' SENSATION.

The Mysterious Disappearance of Mary Churchill and the Unavailing Efforts to Find Her—General Gossip About Matters and Things in the Missouri Metropolis.

ST. LOUIS, Special Correspondence, Aug. 23.—The city was given a sensation last Sunday which is vibrating as strongly now as when the news was first made public. It is in the shape of the mysterious disappearance of a young lady named Mary Churchill, the seventeen-year-old daughter of Col. Churchill, a well-to-do and well-known citizen, who resides at 2737 Morgan street. Up to the present writing the case has worn a cloak of mystery which not even the most astute detectives have been able to tear aside. Col. and Mrs. Churchill left their house for a drive Sunday afternoon, and returned about 8 o'clock in the evening. Shortly after their return they missed Mary, and made inquiries for her. The rest of the family, two young children, could tell nothing of her whereabouts, and supposing the girl had gone to visit some friend, they felt no further uneasiness until 10 o'clock, when, Mary not returning, they grew alarmed, and visiting first one neighbor and another, did all they could to find her. The search was fruitless, and at a late hour, hoping she had gone to stay all night with a friend, they retired in the hope of seeing her in the morning. When morning came and the hours advanced, with no appearance of Mary, Col. and Mrs. Churchill became greatly alarmed and drove about to see every friend with whom it would be likely Mary would stay. After the last possible place had been visited and no news had been heard, the awful fear of foul play entered the parents' heads, and a most careful cross-examination of people who were in the vicinity Sunday evening was prosecuted. It was thus learned that about 7 o'clock, at dusk, Mary left the house by way of the alley at the rear, walked up the half square to Twenty-eighth street, and south on Twenty-eighth street to Lucas avenue. She was seen by several people on the way, who also saw her return to the alley and then go into the house. Afterward she again walked over to Lucas avenue, since which time none of her friends have seen her. She was bareheaded, wore an excited look, and was attired in a lawn dress with pin-head dots. Such are the facts in the case, as given to the public. These naturally lead to the conclusion that the girl was run away with; that her disappearance is the result of an ill-advised love match. But what gives an air of mystery to the case is the fact that the young lady was not a gay or lively girl; that she was not fond of beaux, and was of a quiet and very modest appearance. Her photograph, as well as her personal description, shows that she was an exceedingly pretty girl. She is described as being five feet three inches in height, 115 pounds in weight, a blonde, and of plump, round, graceful form. She is an accomplished pianist, but as she could not sing and was not an elocutionist, the theory that she ran away to go on the stage has only a few advocates. The case was given into the hands of the police Monday night by the girl's parents, and they have been working at it with no result ever since. All the friends of the family are at work in the hope of finding the lost girl, and the whole city is interested in the matter. The minutest inquiry has failed to bring out the slightest suspicion against the character of Miss Churchill, as every one who knows her concedes that in deportment and in conversation she was all that a pure, innocent girl would be. Her company was always chosen for her by her mother, who has been unusually zealous about the training of the girl. The only plausible theory besides foul play—for no one suspects that she committed suicide, as she had a fine mind and was always healthy—is that she has eloped with some unknown man, who was probably desirous of winning the girl but who had no social standing. The fact that Mrs. Churchill always pronounced against early marriages is favorable to this theory. A number of clews have been given those engaged in the search, but one by one they have failed to bring about any information as to the whereabouts of the girl.

SIMILAR ST. LOUIS CASES.

The interest in the case is great, probably because it belongs to a class of mysterious disappearances which has been most prolific of sensation. About two years ago a similar case was reported to the police in the disappearance of a young girl from Colorado who was visiting relatives here. The girl's name was Zou Watkins. After a futile search of ten days, one of the fishers for human bodies, who earn a living on the Mississippi river, dragged the body of a girl from the stream, and on investigation it was found that it was all that remained of Missouri Watkins. A coroner's inquest revealed the fact that the body had no marks of violence upon it, that the clothes had been undisturbed, and that she did not come to her death by poison. How she did come to her death, no one ever found out, as the theory of suicide was negatived by the fact that she had no means to take her own life, and that she was sound of mind. The disappearance of Miss Zerelda Garrison—an eighteen-year-old daughter of one of the first families in the country—caused a great sensation in St. Louis last January. After two days' search she was found. No satisfactory reason was given the public as to why she remained in a room in a bad locality for ten days. Her statement, that she was kept a prisoner there, was not taken for the truth, as she had been seen several times upon the street in company with men of a low character. Fanny Kirchhofer, a German girl, disappeared last spring, and nothing was heard of her till July, when a detective found her at the house of a colored coachman, where she had been all the time. These cases give a bad color to the one now before our public, but Miss Churchill's splendid reputation causes all suspicions to fall to the ground. It is the general hope that she will be restored to her parents within the next few days.

GENERAL GOSSIP.

The Churchill case is about the only topic of interest in the city. The municipal muddle, consequent upon an attempt by seven members of the council to dictate the mayor's appointments, has been straightened out by the departure for California with the Knights Templar party of two of the seven. Appointments are now going to the council slowly, and are as slowly being confirmed. The Downing high license law, which provides for the closing of saloons on Sundays, has been pretty generally disregarded by the saloon keepers. Out of a total of 1,700 saloons, about 600 are kept open every Sunday. They have all been reported by the police, and now all the city has to complain of in that direction is the law's delay. Test cases have been made, and it is the general opinion that the saloon men will lose. There is a steady efflux to St. Paul every week. The Gem City appears to be the favorite boat, and her register bears the names of fifty or more St. Louisans every time she leaves the levee for the North. Returning, her decks are frequently blocked with tourists who have spent their vacation in Minnesota. The lady or gentleman here who has not spent a summer at St. Paul or Minnetonka is generally regarded as a person who needs the greatest amount of pity. About the only society event which has occurred during the month that is worth mentioning is the Marvin camp meeting. Every year the members of the Southern Methodist churches in St. Louis, or rather the wealthy members, go into camp at a grove named in respect to the memory of the late Bishop Marvin, which is situated about ten miles from the city on the St. Charles Rock road. The camp is approachable to St. Louisans only by vehicle, and as a consequence only those people who have carriages at command attend. The meeting is simply a grand summer picnic with a religious tone. It gives people an opportunity to spend a week in the woods, to retire early and arise when they please, to live a quiet, brief rustic life, and to form companionships they would not be likely to make otherwise. Nothing in the way of conversions is accomplished by the many ministers who gather there, as there is no material whereon to work, except a stray newspaper reporter, or a young lady of some other religious denomination, who goes out to spend a week with her Methodist girl friends just for the fun of the thing. As a fashionable affair, Camp Marvin's summer meeting is a success. The young ladies change their toilets as often as they would at the seashore, and their costumes are fully as ravishing. Young ladies who dance and attend all sorts of winter entertainments are plenty at Camp Marvin, and every evening the dudes who dangle after them are out there on their tea-carts, single-seat buggies or bicycles. There was a large attendance this year. The meeting came to a close to-day.

AMATEUR OPERA.

We have been treated to another amateur comic opera. The last one we had was Wayman McCreery's L'Afrique, which made a half hit here, but met with a cruel fate in New York. The latest effort was made by Alfred G. Robyn, one of the leading organists of the city, and Mrs. H. D. Pittman, the society reporter of the Post-Dispatch. The title of the opera is Manette and it is Frenchy in tone. Mrs. Pittman's libretto is one of the most remarkably dire literary efforts ever laid before a St. Louis public. In neither the plot nor versification is it anything but wretched, while there isn't a funny line or an epigram in it. Why it should be called a comic opera, except in the way of sarcasm, is something impossible to understand. The author kills two of her characters and the composer works in a dirge. There are three pretty airs in the piece, and the music all through shows great care and much originality, but it doesn't catch on. The test of a light opera is the rapidity with which the airs are caught by the audience. It would take a week for a person with a good ear to pick up an air from Manette. The popularity of the composer and the author and the anxiety of their friends to see what the production was like, has filled the Pickwick theater every night this week, and is a matter of consolation to the parties interested. The opera is nevertheless a failure, and it is natural that we should expect reproaches from a few of the faithful and the cultured during the next three months for a depraved taste and a total lack of appreciation of the good, the beautiful and the true.

There is little to look forward to for a week yet in the way of amusement. The theaters will open next week, but there will be no attraction other than variety shows. The George Edgar combination, consisting of Edgar, Plympton, Huebner, Sara Jewett, Henrietta Vaders and a score of lesser lights was to have been here to open Monday next, but the enterprise came to an untimely end in Chicago. Uhrig's Cave is closed, the Ford Opera company having gone to Louisville, so that beyond Manette we have absolutely no operatic or dramatic pabulum.

GREYSTONE' GARNITURE.

The Gorgeous Retreat in Which the Aged Samuel Awaits the Setting of His Earthly Sun, Surrounded by Lavish Luxury and Attended by a Ministering Angel at so Much Per Month.

HASTINGS ON THE HUDSON, Special Correspondence, Aug. 23.—Nyack, or the Place of Elms, as it was named by the Indians, succeeds the little towns of Tappan and Piermont. Strange old stories of an Indian maiden's curse rest upon its elm-fringed heights, "summer's drought and winter's cold," the terrible penalty the town must pay because its old Dutch settlers raised hue and cry when

An Indian maid was borne away
In her lover's arm at twilight gray.

From Nyack we wandered northward to Haverstraw, noted for its brick kilns, then to Stony Point, where gallant old Antony Wayne penned the laconic message: "The American flag waves here," at 2 o'clock one morning to Gen. Washington. This Western Point, with Verplanck's Point on the east shore, forms the southern pass of the Highlands, while old "Cro'nest," so called from a depression near the summit of the mountain, and Storm King, above West Point, form, with Breakneck mountain opposite, the northern gate of the Highlands. Before invading this stronghold of military science, fashion and deliciously delightful scenery, we crossed to the eastern shore and descended the river to that portion of the country over which the genius of Washington Irving has cast a legendary spell. Down through the Sleepy Hollow woodlands we came one golden afternoon, quietly thinking over the scene suggested by the Paulding monument we had passed, on the spot where England's second Sidney, the scholarly gentleman and soldier Andre, was taken. We were on our way to Graystone, ex-Gov. Tilden's superb country seat, between Hastings and Yonkers. Down past Ardsley, a summer home of Cyrus W. Field's, and the Jay Gould palace at Irvington, we invaded—as guest, be it understood—several of the less world-renowned and perhaps more rurally beautiful mansions and baronial parks of this glorious Hudson shore. Nowhere in the world is hospitality so thoroughly charming and unostentatious as among old Westchester county families, nowhere does one meet more delightful people, nowhere do people so quickly find their own level. If that level rise with the fingers of a Jay Gould on the pulse of the stock markets, you will doubtless become a guest upon the exquisite yacht Atlanta, a decidedly more graceful residence than the unwieldy white marble chateau rising from Irvington's locust woodlands. If you have dabbled in the literature of our country and belong to that peaceful old school of semi-poets and demi-journalists who have dwelt in the Idlewilds and Undercliffs along this marvelous old river, then the gates of the far-famed Sunnyside admit you to the perfect peace of its cultured repose. If, however, the money markets of the present and book knowledge of the past have no charms for you, then, perhaps, politics may lead you to seek the genial, gentlemanly ex-governor in the castled heights of Graystone. Ten to one if you see him. He believes in the dolce far niente of a quiet life, not strictly a home life, for, since his elegant and womanly sister has elected to retire to a home of her own in New York, the good ex-governor has wisely yielded to the advice of his distinguished physician and resigned himself to the tenderly thoughtful care of a most estimable party, one whom the Germans would call, "alte gouvernante"—a person neither inferior enough for housekeeper nor high-born enough for companion, but something of a return to first principles—a devoted infantile department chief, a very competent nursery governess.

CASTLE TILDEN.

It would be quite impossible to describe the architectural grandeur of Graystone. A mediæval castle, with crenelated battlements and towers of massive proportions, stands on a commanding hill, which slopes down through orchards and chestnut groves to the great river. The central tower rises above a porch approached by three colossal stone staircases. The front is for carriages. You step at once upon the granite pavement three feet above the ground, and ascend to the broad porch-like veranda, while semi-circular steps lead up from either side. The vestibule with tessalated pavement, blue, buff and white, is exquisitely carved in walnut, paneled in porcelain and painted in Egyptian design above the elaborately carved panel frames. A low-voiced valet admits you to a superb hall, nearly forty feet wide, and running the whole length of the mansion to the river view piazza in the rear. The splendor of Eastern looms gives portieres of exquisite workmanship to the grand salons and reception rooms opening off from this huge hall, carpeted with rugs of princely price, and hung with choice studies from the antique and Vatican treasures. On the right is a small study, library or office, the daily abode of the ex-governor's private secretary. Books, bells, telephone, and we believe telegraph also, connect this room with New York and the rest of the world. A door leads into the private retiring rooms of the ex-governor, where he rests from over arduous labors, and where he takes his afternoon nap, soothed to slumber by the voice of his lady reader. Then the great staircase leads up to the apartments for guests, as there is no family to enjoy them. Beyond this staircase, still on the left, is the dining room, a charming apartment furnished in black walnut and green leather, great glass closed etageres of rare porcelains and silver, tall ferns and palms and epergnes of exquisite exotics on every side. The views of the river and northern pleasure grounds from the broad stone mullioned windows of this room are grand in the extreme. Crossing the hall we pause for a moment on the broad veranda to look down on the green clover fields, orchards, and that wondrous tree, another Charter oak, but known in all the country round as the Tilden oak—a tree which so fascinated the governor a few years ago that he had a solid embankment, sixteen feet high, shoveled down, so that he could see the oak from this veranda. A tastefully-furnished boudoir, opposite the dining-room, adjoins the drawing-room, which, in its furniture of blue and gold, is not unlike the blue room at the White House. Superb vases of Sevres, Dresden and Limoges, marvelous tables and cabinets of Indian and Abyssinian workmanship, a few master-pieces of French and Spanish art grace this princely room. Then almost wearied at looking at the numerous art-objects and the elaborate embroideries of tables, mantles and sofas, we enter a fascinating little boudoir in Indian red shades of damask and satin. Here are portraits on the wall, the grandmother and grandfather of the governor are represented as admirable old people, plain, simple Quaker folk, with genial, pleasant faces. From this lazy-woman's paradise of lounge, softly-cushioned chair and well-stuffed window seat, we pass to a reception room on the left of the entrance and opposite the secretary's sanctum. In the regal splendor of crimson velvets and vases fit for an imperial museum, we paused to rest until the valet came to show us the upper rooms and take us to the leads of the tower to see one of the most glorious views the banks of the Hudson afford.

UPSTAIRS

the upper rooms, similar in arrangement to those below, but most luxuriously furnished in English fashion for the reception of guests, surround a broad hall, whose walls are lined with bookcases, containing most valuable editions of works upon literature and art. Still up to another story we ascend, to find more guest chambers, seductively furnished with lovely French cretonnes and chintzes in all the easy grace and elegance of Parisian interiors. Steep wooden staircases lead into the tower, where there is a fine telescope, through which objects are plainly seen at a distance of fifty miles. Up a steep stairway we reach the leads, the roof of the great central tower, and, gazing down on what seemed an acre of elaborate iron coping and slate roofing below, and less pretentious turrets than the one on which we stand, we feel how firm a foundation we occupy, then fearlessly gaze off to the highlands and Storm King on the north, over Long Island sound to the great island itself to the east, a few purple hills over the crest of the grand old western Palisades, then down the river to Staten Island, which lies like an emerald gem on the chrysoprase of the ocean. A subdued twilight shrouded the land around us, only away in the south the sun was pouring down the golden light of noonday. Moments passed rapidly away on these entrancing heights. We almost forgot what we were awaiting—the awakening of the master of Graystone, the politician who grants audiences as an emperor might, but probably wouldn't, were he overwhelmed by such a crowd of axgrinders as is the ex-governor. We did not call to talk politics or dip our journalistic pen into interviewer's ink. What we see we are reasonably sure of, what we hear we rarely insult wisdom by transmitting to our dear, delightful public.

BONANZA MACKEY'S PLANS.

Vice President Cummins Explains What the Directors of the Postal Telegraph Company Intend to Do.

One of the principal topics of discussion in down-town business circles, now that the telegraph strike has closed, is the purchase by Mr. John W. Mackey and his friends of the controlling interest in the Postal Telegraph company. Inasmuch as Mr. Mackey has announced his intention to organize a gigantic opposition to the Western Union company, a great deal of anxiety is manifested as to his plans. A representative of the New York Star was given, by Vice President Cummins, a statement of what the new management intends to do:

"We now have plenty of cash at hand with which to work," observed Mr. Cummings, "and hereafter we shall not be hampered by the want of funds. Mr. Mackey intends to put his shoulder to the wheel in earnest, and when a man of his wealth and sagacity takes hold of a scheme the public can rest assured that the project will be a success. We are now prepared to inaugurate an entire change in the telegraph system of the country. It is our intention to establish cheap and uniform rates for the transmission of messages to all of the principal cities and places in the United States, and to be prepared to transact any required volume of business without delay. We will provide prompt and reliable communication between the stock and produce exchanges and boards of trade of the large cities, and between them and the Atlantic cables."

"What will be the character of the lines?" was asked of Mr. Cummins.

"The line which we have already constructed between New York and Chicago is a sample of the kind of lines which will be extended throughout the United States. We will soon have trunk lines extending from New York to San Francisco and to all the large cities, while local and loop lines will be run to all important points on the main lines. No expense will be spared to make the 'plant' first-class in every respect. We will have nowhere less than forty poles to the mile. These poles will be thirty feet in height, of unusual size and strength, deeply and firmly set in the ground, and well secured on curves and at exposed points. There will be used heavy compound wires of such superior conductivity that the electric current on them will not be disturbed by storms and atmospheric charges."

"What is the present property of the company?"

"We own the already constructed line between New York and Chicago; a large wire factory at Ansonia, Conn.; the Leggo-automatic system of telegraphy, the Gray harmonic system. These, I believe, embrace all the most valuable improvements in machine, automatic and multiple telegraphy, fully covered and protected by fundamental patents. Our company can indefinitely increase its business by simply increasing the number of operators to the extent of 100 or more on a single wire; whereas, by the common Morse method now in use, each operator occupies a wire exclusively in sending a single message, and in order to increase the business the number of wires must be increased accordingly."

"How about the Atlantic cables?"

"We have a contract for the exclusive interchange of business with a cable company that proposes to immediately construct and lay two sub-marine ocean cables, connecting the lines of this company with all the principle cities of Europe, the cable rates to be cheap and uniform, corresponding to those of this company."

"Do you intend to rent wires to private parties?"

"That is a part of our plan. In addition to the large earnings from commercial business, the company will receive a large sum from the rental of special wires and privileges, for which the demand now greatly exceeds the supply. This is also true of the trunk lines proposed, and each additional trunk line built will greatly increase the aggregate earnings. We expect that the rental of wires and privileges will be sufficient to pay interest on the cost of the lines. Each trunk line between any two cities will pay within itself, and their earnings will be vastly augmented when combined and connected with the cables, and they will inevitably monopolize the business between these cities, to the exclusion of all other companies, making the net earnings of the company sufficient to pay the interest on all its bonds and a large dividend upon its capital stock."

Mr. Cummins said that he expected that the Postal Telegraph company would grow rapidly, and as illustrating the possibilities of its career, he cited the remarkable growth of the Western Union company. The latter company began as the House Printing Telegraph, with a capital of only $360,000. Now it controls the lion's share of the telegraph business of the country. The increase in the volume of business and the amount of earnings have kept pace with the increase of capital, the traffic of the Western Union company alone, now amounting to over 30,000,000 of messages, gross receipts, $17,000,000, and net earnings, $7,000,000 per annum. In conclusion Mr. Cummins remarked:

"The Postal Telegraph company, with its perfect wire, improved systems, trunk lines, cable connections, superior and reliable service and cheap and uniform rates, will enter the field with a certainty of success."

Vanderbilt's Gifts.

Saratoga Letter: It appears, after all, that there is more good in Baron Vanderbilt than he has generally been credited with. Mr. Leet, one of the editors of the Season, has been investigating the matter, and has discovered that during the past few years the baron has disbursed over $3,000,000 in private charities. This money has been distributed unostentatiously. None but his most intimate friends have known of the benefactions. But there are figures to prove that the money has gone in the channels to which it was directed. Really, with these facts in view, it does look as though the public have been a trifle hard on the baron. It is true that his face does not indicate benevolence, but even Lavater sometimes made mistakes in his study of physiognomy. That Vanderbilt has been willing to submit to the charge of penuriousness shows that there is more in him than was generally supposed, and that he has been content to do good with the right hand without letting his left and all the world know all about it. Maud S. is still one of the attractions at the Spa, and dropping in at Baker's gallery the other day, your correspondent saw a photograph of the famous mare, which was life itself. The picture was taken by S. P. Wills, and it is understood that the Baron intends to have a number of large pictures of his favorite made by the same artist.

THE VEILED WATERFALL.

In front of falling waters I reclined,
Which down a chasm tore their thunderous way;
Birches before them rose, with emerald spray
Screening the silvery form which shone behind,
With every fitful wafting of the wind
The leafy veil was lifted, to display
The crystal splendor in its white array—
The changing drops in changeless form confined.
Thus earth's fair dreams and fancies intervene
And veil heaven's glory from our mortal eye,
Dimming things hoped for by things felt and seen;
O for God's breath—the Spirit from on high—
To flash upon us, through the sundered screen,
The living waters of Eternity!

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

A GRAND DEMONSTRATION.

The Celebration at St. Paul of the Opening of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Presence of General Grant, President Arthur and a Host of Eminent Guests.

On Saturday and Sunday last, the three sections of President Villard's grand excursion party across the continent, arrived at St. Paul, and were quickly transferred to the mammoth Hotel Lafayette, at Lake Minnetonka, where most of them remained until Monday, the day fixed for the great celebration at St. Paul, which had been preparing for some days.

ST. PAUL IN FULL DRESS.

More magnificent decorations never graced a city's thoroughfares. Never, within the same space, has there been more lavish use of colors and flowers in more decoration of streets and buildings. Every one vied with his neighbor in the effort to make known his hearty welcome to the city's guests, and his appreciation of the great event by means of tokens of festivity. The result was that the decorations were too profuse to be specified, and too beautiful for minute description. Indeed, to specify the individual decorators and their efforts would be to publish the entire city directory, with endless profusion of decorative material sandwiched in. Probably every business man in town is to be credited with his mite of display—and some even decorated their dogs, so hot was the fever of generous emulation and rivalry.

THE GENERAL EFFECT.

The general appearance of the principal streets was like a pathway within a dense forest of colors. Third street, especially, because of its narrowness and the height of the buildings, decorated to their very top, seemed fairly arched with bunting its entire length; for it was an absolute wall of brilliant lines on either side, and the banners struck across the street seemed to shut out the sky. The wholesale district whether on Third, Sibley, Fourth, Fifth or Wacouta, presented a marvelous brilliancy, every building being draped and festooned to the very limit of its frontage. Jackson, Robert, Cedar, Minnesota, Wabasha, St. Peter and Seventh streets were a maze of flags and appropriate decorations, and every residence neighborhood had its quota of patriotism who decorated right royally. It was a common comment among visitors that "never was city more beautiful."

To the greatness of the display was added the factor of great people and great crowds. Gathered in St. Paul were more notables, speaking with a cosmopolitan view, than in any city in the world. To see and do them honor were 100,000 human entities, all enthusiastic, all delighted, and —better still—all pleased with each other as well as themselves. Even the policemen forget to be dictatorial, and it is credibly stated that a hack driver said "Thank you." Looking up or down Third street from the Pioneer Press building, the scene was striking, beautiful and a memorable one. Above, the oriental arch reared its blaze of bright color and seemed a gateway to greater grandeurs beyond. Down, streamers, banners, mottoes, evergreens, flags, every conceivable article of adornment swayed to and fro in the cool wind, or stood out in picturesque shapes and brightest tints. When from curb to curb the street was packed with moving men and profusely decorated vehicles—the sidewalks had been filed with people from early morning—the whole effect was simply indescribable. What was true of Third street was to the full as much so of Wabasha, Jackson, Seventh, Fourth, Fifth, Sibley, Wacouta and Broadway, in the business portion, and in a smaller way of every street within the amphitheater of hills. Clear out on St. Anthony hill were waving flags and glittering decorations. In short, St. Paul put on such gala garb as she has never even aspired to before, and will not wear again for years.

Perhaps a better idea of the affair obtained by the statement that the processional pagentry reached overr ten miles of streets.

The whole party arrived from Lake Minnetonka at nine in the morning, and the people were notified by the booming of cannon on Capitol square and the blowing of whistles in the harbor that the celebration proper had begun. President Villard, Mrs. Villard, Gen. Grant and Mayor O'Brien were seated in the first carriage. In the second carriage were Gen. and Mme. von Zylander, Miss Villard and Col. von Zylander. In the third carriage were Hon. William M. Evarts, Hon. H. M. Teller, Master Harold and Oswald Villard. Hon. L. Sackville West, British minister, Miss West and companion occupied the fourth carriage, and Baron Von Eirendecher, Count Lippe-Winsfield, occupied the fifth carriage. Other guests were distributed as follows: Count de Bildt, charge d'affaires of Sweden and Norway; August Feigel, German consul general, New York; Ottmar Von Mohl, German consul, Cincinnati, Ohio; German guests in fifteen carriages; English guests in ten carriages; governors, United States senators and representatives in seven carriages; officers of the United States army in five carriages; government officials from Washington in four carriages; mayors of other cities in two carriages; presidents of board of trade and chamber of commesce in two carriages; directors and officers of the Northern Pacific and other railroad corporations in six carriages; members of the press in ten carriages. The guests were escorted to Rice Park by Gen. Sanborn, chief marshal and aides at the head. Following these came a platoon of thirty-two police under sergeants Walsh and Morgan. Then came a hundred lads in fantastic uniform, mounted as special aides, followed by the Fort Snelling band of twenty-five pieces; the Ames Zouaves, who were warmly applauded; a battalion of the Twenty-fifth United States (colored) infantry, two hundred strong, commanded by Col. Gaines Lawson, an officer deservedly popular. These troops were generally remarked for their proficiency and soldierly bearing. Battery F, Fourth United States artillery, followed, ninety strong, with four guns, commanded by Maj. L. G. Smith. Twenty-five Sioux Indians in war paint, accompanied by squaws carrying papooses, brought up the rear of this section of the parade, and were received everywhere with warm applause and amused expressions. The Great Union band, playing splendidly, came gaily down the street and received the plaudits of the crowd. Then the First regiment, led by Col. Bend, marching superbly, and the Emmet Light Artillery. The G. A. R. and other war veterans, fifty strong, brought up the rear of the First division, and received the warmest recognition.

Passing under the grand triumphal arch, corner Third and Cedar streets, President Villard, surprised and pleased beyond measure at the enthusiasm everywhere manifested, raised his hat in acknowledgment, just as a shower of roses, tossed by a score of maidens, representing St. Paul and Portland respectively, fell upon his bared head and into the carriage, and were scattered over Gen. Grant, who smiled his acknowledgements, and upon Mrs. Villard, who bowed and smiled and looked the pride she could not speak.

As the remaining guests passed under the arch in turn flowers were rained upon them, and it was noticed that the elder gentlemen were the most gallant in their acknowledgements, raising their hands and throwing kisses to the fair nymphs. Just west of the triumphal arch two four-gun forts were constructed, and these were crowded with children dressed in white, who, provided with bouquets, awaited the arrival of the grand procession.

The procession moved to Rice Park, near the Metropolitan. Several sections of opera chairs stood in the park for the accommodation of Mr. Villard's guests of the city. The seats commanded an unobstructed view of Fifth street. In the front row were Mr. Villard and Gen. Grant, sitting side by side; Gov. Hubbard and the general officers of the national guard; Gen. Terry and staff, and Bishop Ireland; while immediately in the rear Mayor O'Brien and ladies had seats. Ex-Secretary Evarts also had a seat near by; and on all sides, sitting or standing, were the distinguished Americans and foreigners, decked with white satin badges, and button-hole bouquets.

The committee had provided refreshments, abundant and tempting, for the guests. Beneath a canopy near the band stand and around its parterres of flowers stood a lunch table, laden with good things and garnished with bouquets of bright flowers. To this table all were invited, and after the eye had tired in watching the stream of exhibits that passed around the park—for even the procession became tiresome in its endless array of industrial and commercial displays—there was a general movement toward the center of the park. The lunch included cold chicken sandwiches, fruit of all kinds and wine, etc.

Mr. Villard was saluted time after time from the ranks of the great procession, and each time raised his hat in response. Even he, well acquainted with St. Paul as he is, could not refrain from expressing amazement and gratification, as he viewed the display which had been prepared in honor of himself and the Northern Pacific. Gen. Grant was also pleased. "I have seen many grand processions, civic and military," said the illustrious soldier and citizen, "but such a display as this of a city's industries I have never seen."

After viewing the procession for several hours, the party left for Minneapolis and Minnetonka. As the party pulled out of the Union depot a large crowd gathered around the first car, which contained Mr. Villard, Gen Grant, William M. Evarts and others. These gentlemen appeared on the platform of the car in response to loud calls and each bowed acknowledgement to enthusiastic cheers. Mr. Villard made a few remarks, saying:

"Gentlemen of St. Paul. It is almost unnecessary for me to express to you my appreciation for this kind and magnificent reception. You well know that you have my heartfelt thanks. I only regret that I cannot have all the citizens of St. Paul within reach of my voice, so that they might hear my personal testimony to their hospitality. I will not say good-bye to you now, because I shall never want to say good-bye to St. Paul. I am going away from you for a little while, but I hope soon to be with you again. I trust that in the future I shall not be required to spend so much of my time in New York as I have in the past. The necessity of remaining there to provide for the financial necessities of the road is, I am glad to say, nearly over. It is now time to settle down more in St. Paul—the point from which the road is to be operated—and see that it is managed so as to reflect credit upon the company, as well as bring prosperity to your city and the great country it traverses."

The celebration of the morning, at least as far as the official reception of Mr. Villard was concerned, was repeated in the afternoon, when St. Paul turned out en masse to welcome within her confines Chester A. Arthur, the president of the United States. For the past two months Mr. Arthur, accompanied by Secretary of War Lincoln, Gen. Phil Sheridan, Gen. Stager of Chicago, Judge Rollins of New York, Col. Gregory, Col. Mike Sheridan, Capt. Clark, Senator Vest, Gov. Crosbie, of Montana, and Mr. Vest, son of the senator, have been in the wilds of the Northwest, enjoying the rough life of the tourist, and viewing the wonders of the Yellowstone valley, and the Northwestern country generally.

At the depot in St. Paul the state militia, a a battalion of the Twenty-fifth infantry, U. S. A., and the full St. Paul reception committee of the morning were in waiting. The militia and regulars were marched into the depot building and brought to front on either side of the main corridor. As the commander in chief of the American army entered the depot building the soldiery were brought to a present, and with uncovered heads, President Arthur and his guests, Gov. Hubbard and the state officials, and the reception committee, passed the line of soldiery. Outside the depot on Sibley street and in the immediate neighborhood, 20,000 people lined the streets, and when the city's distinguished guests emerged a great shout of welcome went up, and for fully fifteen minutes the deafening clamor was continued, mingled with the roar of an artillery salute and the clang of many bells.

President Arthur, bronzed like an Indian by the penetrating rays of Montana's August sun, as he stepped on the sidewalk, gracefully raised his tall but battered white hat in acknowledgment of the enthusiasm which his presence had created. He was easily discerned by the cheering mass of humanity everywhere surrounding him.

The President was escorted to the State Capital where a lunch had been provided in the Senate Chamber. There was no speechmaking, the time being solely spent in hand shaking and quenching the thirst of the tired travlers and their equally thirsty hosts. A cry was made for the secretary of war and the son of the martyred president. Mr. Lincoln was unacquainted with any of those in line, but he said briefly, "I am glad to greet and shake hands with those who are anxious to see the son of Abraham Lincoln." President Arthur then made his way from the chamber, and as he appeared another shout made the building ring. The party then made a tour of inspection of the capitol, after which a short ride around the city was taken and the whole party started for Hotel Laffayette, Lake Minnetonka, where they had a grand reception from the Villard party, but were obliged to leave for Chicago before it was half over.

The banquet was probably the most magnificent affair ever known in the northwest. Some six hundred were at the tables, nearly all of those from out of the state being distinguished in various respects. President Arthur sat at Mayor O'Brien's left and President Villard at his right. Gen. Grant at his right. Gen. Grant entered shortly after nine o'clock, and as he passed up the center of the dining-room he was received with the heartiest applause. The mayor of St. Paul proposed the "health of the president of the United States," and president Arthur briefly responded.

Mayor O'Brien then made a speech of welcome, responded by Henry Villard, at the conclusion of Mr. Villard's speech President Arthur and suite took their departure for the special train which was to carry them to Chicago. As the President passed out of the banquet hall he was cheered again and again. Other speeches were made by Hon. E. T. Drake; Secretary Teller; Hon. C. Sacksville West, the British Minister; Dr. Hoffman of Germany; Gov. Hubbard; Gen. A. H. Terry; Hon. Alex. Ramsey; Mayor Ames of Minneapolis; Hon. Carl Schurz, etc.

Minneapolis also had a celebration on Monday, which in most respects was a counterpart of the demonstrations at St. Paul. Mr. Villard was present, and also (for half an hour) President Arthur. The procession was very long and represented the various trades of the city.

A Booming Texan Town.

The town of El Paso, Texas, is thus graphically described by a correspondent of the San Francisco Bulletin: "It seems here like '49 and '50 times in San Francisco and Sacramento, when everybody wanted something to buy, and every one had something to sell. Business is lively, the town is growing, new buildings are going up to supply the demand for stores and offices. Three new churches are being built, adobes are being revamped with modern fronts and roofs. Railroads are being constructed from all directions, some of which are just in. All of them are enlarging their borders and building depots. There are few warehouses, however, and only little freight thus far. There are mines on all sides of us; and sacks of ore in everybody's hand—horn silver in chunks, plenty of galena and copper."

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

Postmaster General Gresham, in his annual report, will review the question of the government assuming control of the telegraph service of the country. He is convinced that the country is in favor of such action, and it is understood that he is in favor of the scheme. The only danger, he thinks, lies in increasing the offices, but a properly conducted civil service should do away with any trouble.

Postmasters commissioned: Iowa: Mrs. Mary A. Masterson, Conkling; Dakota: J. Albert Buss, St. Lawrence. Postoffices established—Dakota: Stetson, Jerauld county. Minnesota; Lake Wilson, Murray county. Postoffice name changed—Wisconsin: Toker Creek, Dane county, to Toker. Star service established—Wisconsin: Weston to Dawnsville six times a week; Durand to Eaugalle and back, six times a week.

Dorman D. Eaton, speaking of the nonpartisan character of the work of the civil service commission, instanced a case in Newark, N. J., where the postmaster, having two vacancies to fill, appointed the persons standing highest on the list certified by the commission, and both appointees were Democrats. He hears of similar cases from various points.

The relegation to internal revenue collectors in the respective districts to decide what are medicinal preparations and what compound liquors have exposed commissioner Evans to a storm of protests on the part of attorneys here, who are deprived of much business by this order.

A private letter to an army officer in Washington states that under no consideration will Gen. Hancock accept the command of the Army of the West, to succeed Gen. Sheridan. The friends of Gen. Schofield believe that he will be detailed for the post.

The Washington Star says it is rumored that an investigation will be made shortly in the interest of the government, and there will be some startling and sensational developments as to how the verdict in the star route trial was secured.

Lieut. Robertson, of the First United States cavalry, charged with duplicating pay accounts, pleaded guilty at Vancouver, but denied he had fraudulent intentions. The court martial reserved sentence until this week.

The August decrease in public debt was $6,691,951.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

A deed of conveyance from the Minneapolis & Northwestern Railroad company to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway company, being a transfer of the line from Minneapolis to St. Cloud, a distance of sixty-three and a half miles, with right of way, depot grounds, etc., for the sum of $1,332,790 25, was filed with the secretary of state recently, as was also a deed of transfer for a nominal consideration of the Casselton branch railroad to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba company. The latter road is being constructed from Everest, by the way of Casselton, Blanchard and Mayville to the international line at a point on the north line of Pembina county, in Dakota Territory, upon which $408,807.59 has already been expended for construction.

General Freight Agent Bird, of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway, states that the railway companies to whom the requests of the millers have been presented had decided that they would not make concessions in the matter of rates that were desired by the Minneapolis millers, who had a conference with the railroad men in this city a few weeks ago, the millers are now allowed to accompany grain in transit, Mr. Bird stated, and this was all the privilege that would be granted them.

The Northern Pacific Railroad company has issued its first through freight tariff. It quotes rates, per 100 pounds, to Portland, as follows: From St Paul, Duluth, Minneapolis and Superior—First class, $5 55: second class, $3.75; third class, $3: fourth class, $2.35; class A, $2.10; class B, $1.85; class C, $1.60; class D, $1. 35.

Owing to trouble between the Des Moines & Fort Dodge railroad and the Minneapolis & St. Louis, the latter trains only run to Angus, and no connection is made with Des Moines. The trouble will probably be adjusted, and through trains resumed in a few days.

Fond du Lac, Amboy & Peoria railway has fallen to the possession of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul company. There are only thirty miles of track running from Fond du Lac to Iron Ridge, Wis.

GENERAL NEWS GOSSIP.

Duluth dispatch: A party of 250 Icelanders came in on the United States Empire on the morning of the 30th inst., and after remaining in Duluth all day left for the vicinity of Crookston, Polk county, where they will settle. They are about as cleanly a lot of immigrants as have paid Duluth a visit. The party attracted considerable attention on the streets. The head-dress of the women was especially peculiar. It consisted of a piece of black cloth, to which was attached a large tassel, which dangled by the side of the face. It affords absolutely no protection to the head. There was no variety of styles, all being of a similar pattern.

Oystermen in New York promise a large crop. A new kind of oyster, small, and resembling in its roundness and plumpness the English native, has recently been received at Fulton Market from Pequomic Bridge, Conn., where, instead of being planted on the ground, they grow on stakes, to which they adhere. They average a peck to each stake, but as yet are very scarce.

A business meeting of the Free Thinkers association or Rochester elected the following: President Dr. T. L. Brown of Binghampton; treasurer, William T. Bell of Boston; recording secretary A. B. Reports from the Vermillion-Lake Indian reservation say that the establishment of the government school there, for which teachers were first secured this year, is proving to be a great good. The school has between twenty and thirty pupils, and most of them are said to be making good progress.

At Brenham, Tex., Thomas Hoxsie, aged twenty-one, son of Dr. Hoxsie, while passing on horseback through one of the principal streets, carrying a double-barreled shotgun, was shot dead off his horse by William Lesiard, about the same age. The young men had a personal difficulty.

FOREIGN NEWS NOTES.

At the meeting of the Irish National league Davitt, Sexton and Parnell were present. Parnell in his speech referred to the success of the efforts in the Irish parliament to promote the laborers' tramways and migration schemes. He said he felt the Irish would gain in full the programme of measures for which the league had been formed. Parnell thanked the Irishmen and Australia for their support of the cause of progress in Ireland, which had grown more encouraging. He said fifty English members of the house of commons supported the measures necessary for Ireland. O'Shaughnessy has resigned his seat in commons for Limerick, to take a government office.

Parnell, in his speech at the meeting of the Irish National league, said he could report the most encouraging progress of the league movement in America. He said he had been informed that they might, after a time look for pecuniary assistance from that country which would at least equal the amounts of sums of money received in times of urgency. He had every hope that the migration scheme would prove successful, and thus enable the people to keep their promise that they would never again appeal to America for aid against famine.

A "Giddy" Wife Gone Wrong.

CHICAGO, Special telegram, Aug. 29.—Mrs. Minnie R. Tanner, wife of Henry H. Tanner, a commercial traveler for John C. West & Co., eloped on Monday with a man supposed to be a former boarder, named Perkins. Mrs. Tanner is described as a woman who has always been "giddy," and for the past three months has endeavored to draw her husband's salary, about $50 weekly. Mr. Tanner objected and ordered that she be paid not more than $20 a week. This incensed the wife. On Monday last she sold all the furniture, valued at $3,000, and decamped with a man, leaving her two children with her brother at Noblesville, Ind. Mr. Tanner is at present traveling in Minnesota, but so far West & Co. have been unable to reach him.

Fees for Claim Agents.

Commissioner Dudley will make a strong effort next winter to have the law allowing claim agents to collect fees in advance repealed. The effect of the repeal would be to place agents and pensioners on the footing occupied before the passage of the law of 1878. Through that law restrictions thrown around attorneys were removed. The consequences to both claimants and the government have been disastrous, inasmuch as the temptation of a few dollars in each case, has led the sharks to scrape the county with a fine tooth comb to drum up applicants, without regard to whether they had good claims or not. The effect of this on the government is to load the pension office down with cases necessitating the employment of hundreds of extra clerks. There is thought to be little doubt that congress will readily take this phase of the pension difficulties up, and at least correct existing evils.

Sensational Tragedy at Elgin, Ill.

A sensational tragedy was enacted at Elgin, Ill., at 3 o'clock on the 30th., at the Notting house. Edward F. Joslyn, a widower, shot and killed Etta Buckingham, a young woman. Joslyn had been paying attention to Miss Buckingham of a nature which created some comment, and he has lately displayed evidences of fierce jealousy. He attempted to enter her room that morning, and being denied admission forced his way into her apartment. There was a scuffle, two revolver shots, and the woman fell dead. Joslyn immediately committed suicide with the same weapon. Edward F. Joslyn, the main actor in the tragedy, was a nephew of Judge M. L. Joslyn, assistant secretary of state.

A REAL NICE GIRL.

One of the Kind We Love to See and Think Pleasantly About.

Washington Capital.

I saw a girl come into a street car the other day, though, who, I was ready to bet, made her own dress, and how nice she did look. She was one of those clean, trim girls you see now and then. She was about 18 years old, and, to begin with, looked well fed, healthy and strong. She looked as though she had a good sensible mother at home. Her face and neck and ears and hair were clean—absolutely clean. How seldom you see that. There was no powder no paint on the smooth, rounded cheek or firm, dimpled chin; none on the moist, red lips; none on the shell tinted, but not too small ears; none on the handsomely set neck—rather broad behind, perhaps, but running mighty prettily up into the tightly corded hair. And the hair! It was of light chestnut brown and glistened with specks of gold as the sun shone on it, and there was not a smear of oil or pomatum or cosmetic on it, and not a pin to be seen in it.

As the girl came in and took her seat she cast an easy, unembarrassed glance around the car, from a well-opened gray eye, bright with the inimitable light of "good condition," such as you see in some handsome young athletes who are "in training". There were no tags and ends, fringes, furbelows or fluttering ribbons about her closely-fitting but easy suit of tweed, and, as she drew off one glove to look in her purse for a small coin for fare I noticed that the gloves were not new, but neither were they old; they were simply well kept, like the owner's hand, which was a solid hand, with plenty of muscles between the tendons and with strong but supple fingers. It would have looked equally pretty fashioning a pie in a home kitchen or folding a bandage in a hospital. It was a hand that suggested at the same time womanliness and work, and I was sorry when it found a 5 cent piece and had been regloved. One foot was thrust out a little upon the slats of the car floor—a foot in a good walking boot that might have plashed through a rain storm without fear of damp stocking—an eminently sensible boot on a two and one-half foot with a high instep, a small round heel, and a pretty broad tread.

The girl was a picture from head to foot as she sat erect, disdaining the support of the seat, but devoid of all appearance of stiffness. Perhaps the whole outfit to be seen, from hat to boots did not cost $50; but I have plenty of outfits costing more than ten times or even twenty times that, which did not look one-tenth or even one-twentieth as well. If our girls only knew the beauty of mere simplicity, cleanliness and health, and their fascination!

FORTY THOUSAND DEAD.

Victims of the Terrible Volcanic Eruption and Tidal Waves of the Island of Java.

The latest advices from Batavia, the capital of Java, show that the volcanic eruptions in that island are much more serious than at first indicated. The disturbances began on the Island of Krakatoa, in the strait of Sunda, about fifteen miles off the coast of Java.

The first eruptions were on Saturday night. On Sunday morning the disturbances had extended beneath the waters of the strait, and these were soon boiling and hissing violently, while great waves dashed upon the Javanese shores, and the temperature of the sea went up nearly 20 deg., even as far away from the original point of disturbance as Madura. The furious waves were lashed into mountains of foam as they came rolling in. The threatening rumblings gradually became more and more distinct, and soon the Malia Meru, the largest of the volcanoes of Java, was belching forth flames at a very alarming rate. Men, women and children rushed in terror from their tottering dwelling places, filling the air with their shrieks of terror. Hundreds were unable to get out before the houses fell and were buried beneath great masses of rocks and mud which were piled up where a few hours before all had been peace, happiness and fancied security. With these terrible eruptions came sympathetic demonstrations from the sea. The overhanging clouds were so surcharged with electricity that at one time over fifteen huge waterspouts were seen. As the eruptions increased in frequency and violence, the disturbance of the waters surrounding the barren coast became more and more violent. Here the waves rushed in with terrific force up the steep, rocky incline, breaking upon the overhanging crags, and receding rapidly, leaving a lava flow cooled just at the moment when it was about to fall over the precipice, and there remaining quickly hardened by contact with the waters. The European and American quarter was first overwhelmed by rocks, mud and lava from the craters, and then the waters came up and swallowed the ruins, leaving nothing to mark the site, and causing the loss of somewhere in the neighborhood of 20,000 inhabitants and those who had tried to find a refuge there. Bantam, once a prosperous and flourishing native city, but practically abandoned many years ago, was entirely covered several times by the waters, and there must have been from 1,200 to 1,500 people drowned. At the last advices the eruptions were still continuing, although their violence had abated somewhat, and it is feared that the end of the disaster will show it to have been one of the most frightful ever known in the history of volcanic eruptions.

Java is an island in the Malayan archipelago, the principal seat of Dutch power in the East, and after Sumatra and Borneo, the largest in the Sunda group. It is between the Java sea and the Indian ocean. The island is 630 miles long by 30 to 35 miles broad, and has an area of 49,730 square miles. The island is traversed throughout its whole length by two chains of mountains, thickly set with volcanoes, active and extinct, varying from 6,000 to 12.000 feet in height.

MORE DISASTROUS THAN AT FIRST REPORTED.

LONDON, Special Cablegram, Aug. 29.—Further particulars of the great volcanic eruption in Java, which have just reached London from Batavia show the disaster to have been even more widespread and more disastrous than reported in yesterday's advices. At noon Sunday the eruptions and shocks were supposed to have reached their greatest height. But late in the afternoon and evening the violence of the disturbances suddenly increased, and the island seemed to be about to be completely buried in a mass of fire and sulphurous ashes. At the same time enormous waves began to dash with great force upon the shores, coming in some places far up into the interior, and great chasms opened into the earth and threatened to engulf a large portion of the islands, people and buildings. About midnight the most frightful scene of the whole disturbance took place. Suddenly an enormous luminous cloud, similar to that which was seen on the Gunong Guntur, but much greater in extent, formed over the Kandang range of mountains, which skirt the southeast coast of the island. The cloud gradually increased in size until it formed a canopy of lurid red and whitish gray over a wide extent of territory. During this time the eruptions increased and streams of lava poured incessantly down the sides of the mountains into the valleys, sweeping everything before them. Here and there a stream of lava would enter an arm of the sea or come in contact with the waters of a river, then the nearest incandescent lava as it protruded from the great stream would suddenly produce

BOILING HEAT AND SICKENING VAPORS,

but the superficial consolidation that almost instantly ensued would prevent any further contact. The fissures that opened in this thin crust as it solidified would emit torrents of vapor, extending high into the air and making a tremendous hissing and seething sound as if a thousand locomotives were simultaneously letting off steam. Here and there in the lava streams were innumerable thin plate-like crystals of feldspar, arranged in trains one behind the other in the direction of the flow of the current, and feldspathic sphericles were rapidly formed in the vitreous matter, resembling those which form in the slag of a glass furnace. One of the most singular freaks of the eruption was the carrying in the midst of the molten lava of a bed of solid ice of enormous size, which had been emitted from one of the craters, carried along by the current, and landed on the extremity on Point St. Nicholas on the northeast corner of the island. This bed of ice was surrounded by a thick envelope of sand and scoria, which are such nonconductors of heat that a red-hot stream of lava running over it will not melt snow. It is supposed this ice had formed the crust of some vast subterranean lake. About 2 o'clock Monday morning the great cloud suddenly broke into small sections and quickly vanished. At the same time the most frightful rumblings were heard, and the columns of fire and smoke on the southeast corner of the island ceased to ascend, while the craters in the other parts of Java seemed to open their fiery throats still wider to let out the greatest quantities of lava, rocks, pumice and ashes yet vomited out. The hissing of these became so loud as to be almost deafening, and the waves washed up on the shores to an unprecedented height. When daylight came it was seen that an extending from Point Capreccio, on the south, to Negery Pafsoreang, on the north, and west to a low point covering an extent of territory about fifty miles square. In this were situated the villages of Negery and Negery Babawang. Of the people inhabiting these places and the natives scattered sparsely through the forests and on the plains none escaped a frightful death. This section of the island was not so densely populated as the other portions, and the loss of life was comparatively small, although it must have aggregated fully 15,000 souls. The entire Candang range of mountains, extending along the coast in a semi-circle for about sixty-five miles, had gone out of sight. The waters of Welcome bay, the Sunda straits and Pepper bay on the east, and of the Indian ocean on the south had rushed in and formed a great sea of turbulent waters. Here and there the peak of a high crater was exposed for a moment by the receding of a great wave, and occasionally a puff of brownish-gray smoke or a slight shower of rocks showed that the volcanoes still continued in active sub-aqueous eruption. The debris of the submerged and destroyed buildings was tossed hither and thither over the tumultuous waters—the only sign left that there had once been inhabited land where all was now a waste of water.

THE TOWN OF TANERANG, within twenty-five miles of the city of Batavia, was swept away by the lava streams, and fully half the population, mostly Javanese, numbering about 1,800, perished. At Speelyk, near Point Salots, the red hot rocks set fire to the houses and swept away all the thickly-settled portions of the town. About ten bazaars, belonging to Europeans were destroyed. The destruction of property is very large, but no lives are known to have been lost. The river Jacotra, on the banks of which Batavia is situated, was so completely checked by the lava and ashes that its course was changed, and from Franco Bridge it flowed down through Tygers strait and joined the waters of the river Emeraden, swelling that stream to an extent never before seen. At the rise high on Cauora Feleleaking, which was almost totally destroyed, and a large number of lives were lost. The island of Onenis, five miles off the mouth of the Tangeran river, and twenty miles east of Batavia, was completely inundated, and the floating dock there was totally destroyed. Cataic, Claps and Tronueur, islands off the coast of Java which disappeared, are out of sight, and not a vestige of them is left. Baby and Cheriba islands, off the north coast but small in extent, lost the few houses and inhabitants on them.

IN BATAVIA

this loss has been largely increased since the last reports. The roof of the governor's house was crushed by a mass of heavy mud, and three of the retainers were killed. The town bridge was destroyed. The Diamond and Pearl bastions badly damaged, and the Bussau redoubt was destroyed. On Cayamaus, Malibar and Lions street, the principal avenues of the city, the damage is very great. Fort Antvoi is entirely destroyed. The town of Faggei was severely shaken and only a few buildings were left standing. The aggregate loss of life from the various elements of the terrible disturbances must be fully 75,000, but the number of those who perished can never, of course, be approximated. A violent shock occurred in the island of Sumatra, Monday forenoon, and it was feared other violent disturbances might follow. Middle Island, ten miles off the Javanese coast, and half way between the extreme points of Java and Sumatra, was almost wholly engulfed in the sea. The small Island of Singkie, probably originally only a cone blown up by an eruptive paroxysm, has entirely disappeared. It was uninhabited.

Great Fire at Green Bay.

The extensive saw and planing mills of the Anson Eldred Lumber and Manufacturing company, in Fort Howard, with the greater portion of the stock on hand, was totally destroyed by fire at an early hour on the 31st. These mills were among the most extensive and best equipped of any in the country, all the machinery being the most costly and latest improved kind. The planing mill and other structures, excepting the saw mill, were erected in the spring of 1879, and the latter about two years later. The total loss on the building, machinery and stock will not be less than $200,000, while the aggregate insurance, as ascertained through the local agencies in Green Bay, amounts to only $65,000. The company consisted of Anson Eldred, his son, Howard Eldred, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mrs. Dr. Brown of Milwaukee. The destruction of these mills throws about 150 men out of employment.

Arrest of Fradulent Pre-emptors.

Deputy United States Marshal Brackett arrived in the city on the 29th inst., from St. Paul and soon after arrested Dr. Wrigglesworth, on a charge of perjury, alleged to have been committed by him when he proved up on pre-emption claims. Wrigglesworth was arrested some time ago on a charge of violating the pre-emption laws, and this second arrest is only the same case taken from a different standpoint. He was taken before Judge Carey, where he had a preliminary examination and was required to give bonds in the sum of $2,000 for appearance at the next term of the United States court at St. Paul. Six pre-emptors—John Trischer, Joseph Champteter, George Cole, Joseph Cherlifious, Samuel Carpenter and Angus Stani—who came in to prove upon their claims, were also arrested. The arrest is for alleged conspiracy to defraud the government. It is rumored on the street that the men the officers are after are Morris Thomas and L. B. Johnson, two prominent pine land men.

We met lawyer M. Nichols, of Duluth, while he was in the city last week, and had a long chat with him during which he told us that if the residents of this valley think that the Duluth & Winnipeg Railroad is a failure they make a grand mistake. Mr. Nichols says that the prospects for an early resume of work upon the line are very bright but he was not at liberty to reveal the reason for the faith that is within him. He bade us tell our readers not to worry as they would soon see their fondest hopes realized and that before another fall we should have direct communication with the great wheat market at Duluth. He reports Duluth as growing steadily and surely. There are several large flouring mills to be put up there right away and next summer will see many more. He has the biggest kind of faith in the future of Duluth which, he says, will be the Chicago of the Northwest Mr. Nichols is very highly pleased with the progress Crookston is making, since he was in business here, and he thinks he will come up to our county fair which opens on the 11th inst.

In conversation with Mr. Frank Bivins, one of our most successful wheat-raisers he informed us that he should thresh from the shock this year, starting the threshing machine about Monday next, with fair weather. Inquiring his opinion as to what the price will be Mr. Bivins said, "It ought to be a dollar a bushel and I think it will be before the season closes, but I do not think it will open out at that. It ought to open out at one dollar and I believe it would if you newspaper men had not the bad habit of reporting extraordinary yields while you are utterly silent on the two and three bushel per acre pieces. Of course, you get your information from the farmers, who like to see their names in print in connection with astonishingly large yields and that may all be very good so far as that goes but, I believe that it largely governs the first prices on wheat and all who are forced by their obligations to sell on first prices are annually large losers by this most pernicious habit. I think it all wrong and needless; while we do raise large crops of wheat in cases where proper attention is paid to cultivation it is a fact that we have many pieces of wheat that are very poor, enough so that if Polk County shows an average of 15 bushels of wheat per acre this fall it is at least three bushels more than I think she will. While we have a soil and a climate better adapted to raising wheat than any I ever saw still it is all contingent upon proper care and management and the habit of estimating our average upon exceptionally good yields is all wrong and very injurious to the interests of the wheat raiser of the valley. We should stick to the facts as they exist for we have a soil and country unexcelled, capable of producing the best crops in the world but the solid stubborn facts are that we are not at present raising as much wheat on an average as we should and we will not do it until farmers do more work with their hands and brains than with their mouths, and until you newspaper men can learn to stick to the facts as they exist. You have a good subject to work on. The country is all that one can desire but, when from any cause we have not got the yield we ought to have, don't misrepresent the facts by claiming that we have." After calling Mr. Bivins' attention to the article which we wrote last week upon the topic under discussion, we thanked him for his frank statements and left, under the impression that he was more than half right about it. Of this much we are perfectly sure that if every farmer will be sufficiently impressed with these views to use the efforts necessary it will put thousands of bushels of wheat more into our granaries than we now do. We have the soil to raise the grain on if the proper care is exercised.

The Glorious Red River Valley.

It is just as natural for some men to look upon the dark side of things in this material world as it is to breathe. We are too prone to regard the face of nature in this glorious Red River Valley through blue-glass spectacles, and, because perhaps our wheat don't look as well as we could wish, we are ready to condemn the whole business while if we would but look around us, through the eyes of the newspapers, we would see that we have every reason for rejoicing, every reason to thank God for a glorious country and a bountiful harvest. While we have had, during the past summer a severe drouth that materially damaged our growing crops, yet the wonderfully re-cuperative qualities of our soil and climate revived the drooping crops with no very perceptible loss and we find that we shall have a pretty fair crop after all while in other portions of the country we read of drouths that have ruined crops entirely, of cyclones that have wrought ruin and desolation in many a happy home, destroying thousands of dollars worth of property and even resulting in great loss of life in some localities. From every portion of the world we read of blights, drouths, cyclones, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, tornadoes, inflicting great suffering from loss of life and property while in this Red River Valley we have had nothing of the kind except a slight drouth the effects of which was not disastrous by any means. In fruit regions we notice that owing to extreme cold weather during the whole season there is a shortage of fruit. "Peaches are rotting badly, pears are dropping off; potatoes are rotting in the ground; grapes are rotting on the vines and the mildew is using up the vines also," writes a correspondent in the east to his home paper and he further states that the weather is so cold, on August 27th, that an early frost is greatly feared which would be a death blow to fruits of all kinds. The fact is that man is a restless animal at best and prone to find fault wherever you place him but, taking everything into consideration we have a soil and climate in the Red River Valley that comes as near perfection as any that can be found in this world and a man who can not be satisfied here will never find a country on this earth that would suit him in every particular. It is not necessary to mis-represent this country—its merits are sufficient to build it up and if a man can have a contented spirit in the best country on earth he can have it here but otherwise he will have to do the best he can. The Red River Valley is all right.

Valuable Information to Farmers.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

For an interview your reporter is indebted to Mr. Sullivan, chairman of the supervisors in the town of Sullivan, Polk county, Minn., and the following information as to the most successful method now used in producing a good crop of wheat in those low level lands in the valley.

Mr. Sullivan is a farmer of very large experience, and owns a large improved farm two and a half miles east of East Grand Forks, and judging from the noise and bustle of self-binders, some three or four in number, he has made a grand success of his farming.

Mr. Sullivan, when asked as to the prospects of a good crop, says we will have a better crop this year, both for quality and quantity, than we have had for the past three years, and your reporter has certainly seen no finer looking wheat in the Red River Valley this season.

Mr. Sullivan when asked as to the process used in securing so good a crop, says "part of my land banks on the grand marais, consequently has a natural drainage and on this land I have always had a good crop."

"What success did you have with the balance of your undrained land?"

"Very poor, in as much that instead of seeding in the usual time, I was, owing to the large amount of surface water, compelled to await some two or three weeks before I could commence seeding, then I did not seed, I only mudded it in. Then taking into consideration my natural drained land, I knew that drainage was all that we required for the level lands in the Red River Valley, the best in the Northwest—all of which our town has demonstrated by issuing bonds to the amount $5000, out of which we purchased a New Era Road Grader, 14 head of horses and graded over twenty miles of good road with a large ditch on either side, and have money enough left out of the said $5000 to build a great many more miles."

"About what does it cost you per mile to build those roads and ditches?"

"Allowing each of our six or seven teams from four to five dollars per day it costs us from thirty-five to forty dollars per mile."

"About how long will those Era Graders last?"

"Well. I cannot say from experience, but we have run our grader constantly and we cannot discover but what it is in about as good a condition as when purchased, and I think with proper care it will last for a great many years."

"How much of your town do you intend grading and ditching?"

"We mean to build a road and ditch on every section line in our township."

After a social visit your reporter started for the Forks, well pleased with his trip and the kindly manner in which Mr. Sullivan entertained him, and he hopes that this information will benefit each and every reader in the city and country as much and more than it has himself.

County News.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

During Sunday night's storm some hail fell northeast of here, doing little or no damage to crops.

Four tramps arrived in town yesterday morning and seemed well supplied with money, as they paid for everything they got in the way of food and drink.

C. A. Curtis, who has been in Gilby township during the past three weeks building a granary for John Scott, returned home on Sunday. Mr. Curtis says the crops throughout the township are looking well, although some damage has been done by the recent hail storms. Our fellow townsmen, C. F. Culver, and John and George Scott's crops were damaged to the extent of 2 to 3 bushels per acre. The frame work of Mr. Culver's three-story elevator which had been raised on Saturday morning, was razed to the ground by the storm.

On Tuesday forenoon, Peter Gilley's team while standing in the rear of Mr. Hollinger's wagon shop, took fright and ran away. At the time, a young Norwegian, called Hans, was sitting on the forward truck, the box not being on, holding the lines. Whether through fright or ignorance, he allowed the lines to hang loosely, simply crying "Whoa!" After crossing the track, and when opposite C. Madson's store, Hans was dropped rather suddenly in the rear, one of the hind wheels passing lengthwise his left leg. His escape from death was miraculous, as it was, he was severely stunned. The team kept up their wild chase for about twenty minutes, and then pulled up near Leon Supernault's house. They were uninjured.

Christian Convention,

FARWELL HALL, CHICAGO,

September 18th, 19th and 20th, 1888.

CONDUCTED BY D. L. MOODY.

To the Followers of Christ in the Northwest:

DEAR BRETHREN: In view of the growing demand for Christian effort to reach the multitudes of our people, it seems eminently desirable that the followers of Jesus should meet and confer together upon practical methods of Christian work. It is hoped, by this conference for united prayer and interchange of experience, to awaken in the churches a deeper spiritual interest, and to bring out practical methods of work adapted to churches and individuals, and to secure a more general consecration to the Master's services. We therefore invite pastors and laymen of all Evangelical denominations to meet in Convention in Farwell Hall, September 18th, 19, and 20th, commencing at 9 o'clock A. M. the 18th.

The following and kindred topics will be discussed:

1. How to interest and set at work the lay element of our churches.
2. What shall be done to secure a more general attendance of the people upon public worship?
3. The importance of systematic visitation.
4. The value of neighborhood prayer meetings. How to organize and conduct them?
5. How can our devotional meetings be made more interesting and profitable?
6. How can the personal and social study of God's word be increased?
7. How may Christians be made to feel their privilege and responsibility as stewards of the property which they hold, and be influenced to use it in the Lord's service?
8. What are the great hindrances to the progress of Christ's kingdom, and how can they be removed?
9. What can the laity of our churches do for Christ?
10. How can the influence of Christian homes be increased?
11. How can we best reach and influence those who habitually neglect the sanctuary?
12. How can we best secure a preparation for Christ's work?
13. What are the best methods of organizing and developing the Christian activity of the entire membership of the church?
24. How may music be best used and controlled in promoting worship and spreading the Gospel?
15 How may our foreign population be evangelized?

Brethren, let us ask our churches to pray for the Divine blessing upon this Convention, that God may give us such scenes of revival and blessing as have so often been given to such gatherings.

We want to know how we may be more efficient in leading souls to Christ; how all the membership of the Church may know this; and this Convention is called that we may learn from the great school of Christians experience.

Mr. D. L. Moody will preside. The singing will be in charge of Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. James McGranahan.

This Call having been endorsed by many of the leading ministers and laymen of Chicago, and by a large number in Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri and Kansas, a meeting was held in the Parlors of the Y. St. Cloud Normal School.

Great improvements have been recently made in the main building of the St. Cloud State Normal School. The entire basement has been handsomely finished for the use of the Model Department. A new steam heating apparatus has been placed in the building; one thousand dollars has been expended in the purchase of new apparatus, and more than fifteen hundred new geological specimens added to the cabinet. Other valuable additions have also been made. These improvements, with boarding at cost, and a good faculty, must make this school one of the best in the country.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, SEPT. 6.

LOCAL NEWS.

Fred Date, of Maple Lake looked the city over, last week.

Our citizens who attended the Minneapolis Exposition, report having had a good time.

Capt. Donoldson, the big Kittson Co., granger, was on Saturday's train, headed north.

Charlie Jackman, an old-time conductor on this line is now running on the Chicago, St. Paul & Milwaukee road.

was detailed to take her to the Insane Asylum at St. Peter, and left on Thursday evening's train with the poor girl in charge.

Miss Alice Van Dyke, after a pleasant visit with the doctor and her many friends in this city, left for Alexandria on Friday evening.

W. C. Andrew, representing the Bradner Smith paper company, was among the callers at the JOURNAL office last Friday. W. C. is a good boy.

Mrs. Wm. Kistenmacher was summoned by telegram to the bed-side of her sick sister on Friday and left for Faribault on the evening train.

We are told that Bro. Dewey of the Bulletin has established a newspaper at Ashby, in Grant Co. We are told that Ashby has aspirations for the county seat.

Henry Lewis, whose departure to Minneapolis the JOURNAL noticed some weeks since, has secured a situation with the Bradner Smith paper company, of Minneapolis, as traveling agent.

D. Z. Horton of Maple Bay, started his steam thresher on Aug, 30th at the rate of 4 bushels of wheat per minute, and 7 bushels of oats per minute. The wheat averaged 22 bushels per acre.

Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Horton, of Niagara Falls, Ontario, are visiting their brother's, P. D. W. and N. W. Horton of Maple Bay. Mr. W. Horton is here with the intention of investing in Polk County dirt.

Archie Campbell has just completed a flowing well 150 fet deep, for Peter Cornelius, on section 15, Fairfax township. The pipe is 1¼ inch and runs full constantly. This is a bonanza for Mr. Cornelius.

Archie Campbell, having obtained a fine flowing well for Peter Cornelius is is after one for Ole E. Rudi, on Section 10, in Fairfax. Soon the town of Fairfax will become as noted for its good wells as it is for its good roads.

Will Kops took a run down to Fergus Falls last Thursday. The daily, (taking it for granted that everybody who got on the train going south last week was going to the fair) said that he had gone to the great fair at Minneapolis.

Broad-ax Brown, who is somewhat known to the residents of this city, and who since he left here has been at Montevideo, is now figuring to establish a new paper down in that country somewhere. As a newspaper man he don't seem to wear well.

Mr. Geo., Reis started his plows going, last week, right in his wheat fields. He had men at work sitting the shocks to one side to get them out of the way of the plow teams. We notice that several others are doing the same thing and if generally adopted there is no danger but that the fall plowing will all be done before the freezing up. A great deal of plowing can be done during rainy times and at odd spells.

Arrangements are being made to start a tar manufactory in the thirteen townships. Last week a company was organized, with Mr, E. O. Engeberg, an old experienced man at the business, as President, and this week Mr. E. and Ole Bang have gone out to put up the necessary buildings for the manufacture of tar. We can see no good reason why an enterprise of that kind will not pay large dividends on the investment.

Last week the JOURNAL gave an account of the capture of an insane woman. Subsequently we learned that her name is Annie Erickson and that she has two uncles living near the Sand Hill River, one in Norman County and the other in Polk County. Owing to the difficulty of locating her residence there was a hitch in the proceedings necessary to examination of the case but at last that was overcome and, upon examination before Probate Judge, Montague on Thursday, she was pronounced insane and Frank Montague

The Minneapolis Fair.

The great Minneapolis Fair is a thing of the past, so far as this year goes and, if we may judge by newspaper reports and our own personal observations on Friday last, which day we spent in looking over the grounds, it was not a great success, financially considered. Nor was it great in point of exhibits with one exception—stock. The agricultural exhibition was fair, but not as good as it could have been made two or three weeks later. Minnesota showed some very fine cereals and vegetables. Bismarck and Mandan, in Dakota spread themselves and made a very fine display indeed. She owes more for the success of that display to the enterprise and energy of her citizens, however, than she does to the superior excellence of the display which was really no more than we of the Red River Valley's fertile fields would call just "fair to middling," but the genius of those who arranged the display made her showing appear very creditable. There was not a very large display from the Red River Valley but what there was was very creditable. This fair, occurring as it did right when our farmers were busy cutting their grain, prevented most from attending or sending in samples of their productions. Everything considered the agricultural display was fully as good as we expected to see. After looking over this department we wended our way to the stock department where we found the best display ever made in the State. By far the largest number of horses and cattle exhibited belonged within the State and showed that our farmers are waking up to the fact that their interests lie not in wheat alone but that stock is an important element in our agricultural economy. The show of horses was magnificent. Horses of all kinds and descriptions from the honest old plow-jogger to the fine limbed trotter were on exhibition and attracted their full share of attention, but the grand display of cattle took our eye and to them we paid the most attention. The display of Short-horns, Devons, Polled Angus, Jerseys, Herefords and Holsteins, from our own State was large and fine, but the Holsteins, (in our humble opinion) far eclipsed all upon the grounds. Being struck with the display made by the Brookside Farm, (which is located on the St. P. M., & M. R. R., at Kirkhoven, in Swift Co.,) we interviewed the manager who told us that the company had upon that farm almost every breed of fancy cattle in existence and that they gave the preference to the Holsteins, being the best breed for practical farm use. The reasons he gave were that the Holstiens are as large and heavy as the largest, therefore made good beef animals, that they beat any other kind as milkers and that they seemed best adapted to our climate being easy keepers and adapted to the coldest weather. Prominent among the Holstein cows we noted one called "Sijtji Bleeker." This cow was imported from Holland by T. E. Whiting, is nine years old, in color is evenly variegated, white head with black circles around her eyes, white throat; black over shoulders and over hips; head rather heavy, with very small bog horns, waxy; shoulders low; chine straight; hips smooth, rump high and level and she has a milk record in four year old record of 14,509 pounds. In 16 days, in 1881, she gave 1,185 pounds of milk; average per day 74 and 1-16 lbs; largest days yield 81½ lbs. The yield for the whole 16 days was 65 pounds more than her live weight, which at that time was 1,120 pounds. This company had 27 Holsteins on exhibition, all as fine as the above described cow, the cows having nearly as good milk records and far better than any other breed upon the farm. The time is coming when our farmers in Polk County will pay more attention to stock than they do now and we should advise any who think of investing in blooded to investigate the merits of the Holsteins, feeling confident that they will not be disappointed in them after a thorough trial. We paid but little attention to the machinery upon exhibition of which there was a fair display. The trotting, we heard many say was not worth as much as in former years and as a whole we sum up the fair as less attractive than any we ever witnessed on those grounds except the stock show which was the grandest ever seen in Minnesota.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELLA Darwin, his wife, mortgagors, did, on the 26th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of [illegible], Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their certain mortgage bearing date the 26th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described land situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars ($558) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin and Stella Darwin [illegible] two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100,) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars, ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 7th day of September A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

The brick veneering on Kretzchmar's block goes up slow but sure.

A. A. Lebedoer's trotter, three-years-old, is being put through his paces. Somebody will be having a horse trot next.

Mr. Draper is daily expecting a new well drill from Rochester, and as soon as it comes will resume work on Kretzschmar's well.

P. C. Schmidt is back from below, full of busines, and reports Red Lake Falls as booming among real estate men in the business centers.

Frits Gerke and A. A. Brunner have bought lots at the north end of Hamilton avenue, on which to build dwellings. Mr. Gerke,s is already all enclosed and will be completed soon. They will be close to their brick yard and at the same time have elegant locations.

Mr. Peters, of the Winnipeg Lumbering Co., looked over our town and water powers on Tuesday last. Of the latter he speaks in the highest praise, and is of the opinion that neither Crookston or any other point on the river can make the slightest approach to rivalry in that respect.

Few persons in town know the extent of the improvements made by Mr. Kretzschmar on the north side of Red Lake River. In addition to clearing the flat above the dam he has had over a mile of road made, much of it actually better than a majority of our streets, and no fuss was made over it either.

We understand that some of the voters of Black River tp, have, after all quarrelled on the grader question, and the company have taken the grader away. How any men possessed of ordinary judgment culd act in this manner, after the machine was on the ground, and its ability to do the work required was demonstrated, passes our comprehension. They evidently have not the slightest idea what the results of thorough drainage and grading would be. and as we fear they are too wise to read newspapers, it is not likely they will ever learn.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Mr. John Labree, who was hurt so badly some time ago by his team running away came yesterday to town for the first time since the accident. He is very weak yet but will soon be all right again.

L. W. Clark one of our recent townsmen is in the new Chicago this week being one of the carpenters engaged in building the new elevator.

Mr. W. S. Morse is erecting a fine residence upon his claim about four miles north of town and he and his family are going out the latter part of this week to take possession of it.

We took a trip through the country last week, and found the farmers all busy harvesting their grain. This week will see the grain all harvested and a good part of it stacked. The farmers north of town however, are getting anxious about their threshing. There is only one machine in this part of the country, and they are afraid he will not be able to get around to them before very late in the fall.

Mr. J. A. Foord brought in on Monday evening last a wild goose weighing 8½ lbs., shot a short distance from town. This is the first goose shot in this vcinity this year and is about as big as they make 'em.

A party of five from this town went out blue-berrying yesterday afternoon and returned last night with about two bushels and a half of berries besides a large numbers of prairie chickens. This was a pretty good afternoon's work.

There was an Indian in town last week from Red Lake, who if placed upon exhibition, would make the fortune of some enterprising showman. He stood 4 ft. 2 in. high, weighed 193 lbs. and was 33 years old. He had the legs of an infant and the arms and body of a giant. The Indians say he is the strongest man on the Reservation and he certainly smells it.

We neglected last week to mention the meeting held in Railson & Williams' Hall a short time since, at which $1,500 bonds was voted for the purpose of of building and furnishing a school house on block five, of C. C. & N's addition to St. Hilaire. Negotiations are now pending, and it is expected that the bonds will be sold this week, in which event work will be commenced upon the school at once.

Messrs. Geo. Crocker, S. O. Cundy, and J. C. Davis, start this week for a trip through the Thief River country. They have taking along about 1,800 shells loaded, to shoot duck, geese, deer or bear, and intend to put in a good time shooting. The principal object of their trip, however, is to get better acquainted with the wonderful country which exists near the head waters of the Thief river. They expect to be absent about two weeks.

Push the Hogs.

The three months of September, October, and November are the best months in which to fatten hogs. When they have been in clover fields, pastures, or stock fields, and are in a good healthy thriving condition they can, during those three months, be fattened very rapidly if they are properly fed and have access to plenty of good drinking water; and the work can be done far more profitably than if delayed later.

Winter feeding for spring market is more expensive feeding as considerable feed is necessarily required to keep the requisite animal heat, and unless great pains are taken to have pens that are snug and warm this extra feeding will amount to a considerable item of the profits. During the fall months when the weather is cool and generally free from storms, stock will lay on fat very fast. For a time it is economy to let them have the run of the pastures or woods; but toward the close, I prefer to pen and feed all they will eat.

If they have not access to a good supply of water they should have a trough which should be kept filled so that they can get what they want. They can be allowed to run until two or three weeks before killing or marketing, when I prefer to pen closely and feed all the corn they will eat clean.

When fattened in this way, if the work is properly done, it will be as cheap as in any other way. It is a good plan to keep little lumps of coal in the pen or where they can have free access to what they want. A small supply of salt to eat will do them no harm. The cheaper hogs can be fattened for market the more profitable they become, and it is economy to take advantage of everything that will increase their growth and thrift with the least expense. Besides, I do not consider it good policy to change too suddenly from one feed to another, as would be the pasture and fed exclusively on corn. alone; they require a variety to keep fully healthy, and the earlier this can be accomplished the better for the stock, and the more profitable to the owner they become. N. J. Shepherd.

Eldon, Mo.

Peterson's Magazine for October comes to us in advance of all others, and more beautiful than ever. The principal steel-engraving, "An Ignominious Flight," is after one of the most popular pictures of the Paris Salon, and is full of humor and graphic truth. There are two sheets of colored patterns, with eight different designs: alone worth the price of the number. The colored steel fashion-plate is of rare loveliness: 'Peterson" is now the only magazine that gives these steel fashion-plates, colored by hand: all the other magazines give mere lithographs. Then there are some fifty wood-cuts, illustrating 'fashions, and work-table patterns of every kind. In the literary contents we find the same originality and merit that long ago placed "Peterson" at the head of the ladies magazines. That charming novelet and love-story, "A Fifth Avenue Romance," is finished, and a new and thrilling one, "The Mystery of the Brocken," began. There is also a racy story, beautifully illustrated, "Philosophy in the Adirondacks" Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, Frank Lee Benedict, etc., etc., make up the other contributors. Without question, "Peterson" is, as it claims, the cheapest as well as best of the ladies' books Its prices to clubs, especially, are, unprecedentedly low. low. Specimens are sent gratis to those wishing to get up clubs. Address Chas. J Peterson, 806 Chestnut Street Philadelphia, Pa.

Eleventh Annual Inter-State Exposition of Chicago, 1888.

Will open September 5th and close October 20. As usual, all Railroad and Steamboat Transportation Lines will put their rates to Chicago and return on hard-pan basis, selling coupon tickets to the Exposition. On many of the lines, gentlemen, familiar with the business, are making arrangements to run general Excursions, which have heretofore been profitable to those managing them, and cheapened the cost of transportation to the Excursionists.

As to the Exposition itself, we are assured that extraordinary efforts and very large expenses have been made by the managers to render it in all important departments the most instructive, and far the most attractive, display, of its class in America. The local pride of Chicago is fully enlisted in the work, and it is safe to say that no visitor will be disappointed.

The Tier says that on Wednesday some lady friends called and "enlightened the hearts of all hands with some wedding cake!" What a pity the ladies didn't think to take along something to enlighten their minds—if such a thing be possible.

The post office thieves, from East Grand Forks have been turned over to the tender mercies of the general government. They had an examination before U. S. Marshal, John N. Ives, on Monday and have been shipped over the road to await trial in the U. S. courts.

We take the following plaintive note from a Michigan paper: "Never since a plow broke the soil of old Michigan has there been such a sickly showing for standing corn!" Well, our advice to you Michiganders is to leave the poor old stranded wreck and pull for the shores of the Red River Valley where the show for No. 1 Hard wheat at a dollar a bushel was never better than this same year of 1883.

Fred Date came down from Maple Lake on Monday to get the buck-shot picked out of him. You see, Fred and another Norwegian, whose name is Moon, discovered a bear about the same time and both started for him. The Norwegian fired and Fred got the dose intended for the other bear, or at least one No. 6 shot in his upper lip which caused him to "put on considerable lip." An even exchange is no robbery, Fred got the shot and the Moon got the bear—for all either one of them know.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

MINE HOST.

Ludwig Uhland.

A generous host, in days of youth,
 Received me as his guest;
A golden apple on a bough
 Light swaying, was his crest.

'Twas the free-hearted Apple-tree
 Whose doors stood open wide;
With nectared foam and sweetest fruit
 I found myself supplied.

To his green-house there gladly flew
 Fu l many a light-winged guest;
They feasted free, danced merrily,
 And sang their very best.

I found a couch upon the grass
 Spread soft and green before me;
My host himself, with shadows cool,
 A covering light drew o'er me.

But he shook his merry, snowy head
 When I begged him for my bill.
O happy hours! O birds and flowers!
 Forever his branches fill.

How Russian Squires Live.

Up to the time of the liberation of the serfs in 1861, says a correspondent of the New York Times, the majority of Russian noblemen had pretty well preserved their fortunes, though it was always the custom to send the young men of the family to serve a few years in the imperial guard in the capitals, and these young men just as regularly used to live there far beyond their means, unless recalled to the country in time by their parents, yet they would quite as often find the means to mend their fortunes by a rich marriage, by getting an inheritance from a maiden aunt having a foible for brilliant guardsmen-nephews, by a lucky stroke at cards, or some other means. The only industry noblemen ever engaged in was the raising of horses on which some of them realized fairly good profits. Such were far from numerous, the majority of country squires knowing nothing beyond hunting, the directions of field labors, the tilling of land, the management of thousands of peasants and hundreds of so-called house servants. Those happy times, when Russian squires lived like so many petty magnates, are gone, however, not to return any more. At the present time Mr. W., my host, for instance, owns in one corner of the government of Toula, a handsome estate of some 10,000 acres, and gets an income of $20,000 or thereabout. To get this he has to work hard enough though, notwithstanding the fact—or may be because of it—there are six or eight different superintendents, bailiffs, overseers, etc., appointed by him to direct the work, all getting handsome salaries. Mr. W. retains but 3000 acres of land for himself, letting the other 7000 to his former serfs, who are happy to pay a dollar—and even more—an acre, since they have no land of their own worth speaking about. When the peasants were liberated, 22 years ago, every grown-up man received some ten acres of land from his former proprietors. Since then young families of peasants have grown into men and women, having children in their turn; the old lots of land exhausted, subdivided, and unable to feed them any more the greatest misery prevailed, thanks to that scarcity of land in many rural districts agents of the revolutionary party, spreading the rumor among peasants that all the land will soon be theirs; but now that the czar, at his late coronation, has emphatically declared to the peasants deputies that he will not allow any new subdivision of lands to take place, the peasants have grown reconciled to their lot, and their only concern now is to hire and buy land from their neighbors and former owners. Mr. W. is offered now by his peasants 150 rubles a "dessiatina," amounting to some three and a half acres. Twenty-five dollars an acre may seem a high price to pay for land in Russia having already been under cultivation for nearly 300 years. Mr. W. and his peasants raise oats, buckwheat, but chiefly rye and potatoes, since their last products are used by the whisky distillery conducted by Mr. W. himself. Apart from what is consumed in food by peasants and the cattle, all is sold on the place to the proprietor, and gets transformed into whisky, from which Mr. W. derives then his chief income.

Witty Waifs.

The Law of Compensation.—Maud: "Isn't it strange, dear, all the fellows who flirt with me are married men? I cannot think what has become of all the batchlors." Gertrude (who is not envious—O, dear no): "Possibly flirting with the wives of your admirers!"

The scarcity of gentlemen at our neighboring summer resort was so apparent that a Boston lady telegraphed to her husband: "George, bring down a lot of beaus for the hop this evening." Thanks to the telegraph manipulator, George arrived with a "pot of beans."

The Concord philosophers have gone to Rocky Point to-day for a clam-bake. Think of the transcendentality of the hereafter indulging in the actuality of a clam! It must accelerate the stream of consciousness.

"On the high road to the capital from the Caspian the members of the expedition sent by the German government to observe the transit of Venus met a lovely vision in habit and hat on a prancing steed. They halted, saluted, and declared their errand. 'To observe the transit of Venus! ah, well, you can go home now, gentleman, your duty is done: good bye;' and the pretty vision disappears at a smart canter 'away in the ewigkeit,' as Hans Breitman says. That joke dawned on those Germans after some hours."

"Philip," said the President, as the wagon came to a halt in the wild Yellowstone region, "Phillip, I've got a good one." "Well, Chester," returned Phillip, "I'm all attention." "Phillip, you know I touched off the Southern Exposition?" Yes, Chester." "Well, Philip, my ambition now is to fire off a canyon!" "Chester," said Phillip, gloomily, "I'm an old soldier. I have suffered many things. I have always been patient. But, Chester, until this moment I have never felt that I could justly ask for my discharge." It was some time before Mr. Vest, with his theodolite, succeeded in restoring good feeling, and the president has since been a little more cautious with his American humor.

The Failures of Last Week.

Bradstreets' Journal furnishes the following: There were 142 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet's in the week ending on the 8th, 16 more than the preceding week, 21 more than the corresponding week of 1882 and 77 more than the same of 1881. Among the firms embarrassed are Benjamin Burges & Sons, commission, C. B. Barrett & Co., wholesale liquors, and Parker and Garrett, agricultural implements, Boston; Butterworth & Co. and Hugh Mackenzie, manufacturers of boots and shoes, Cincinnati; Chrisholm Bros. & Gunn, mill furnishers, Chicago and Minneapolis; Curme Dunn & Co., manufacturers of leather, Richmond, Ind.; H. Dudley Coleman & Bro., manufacturers of machinery, New Orleans; the Brazil bank of Brazil, Ind.; the Warren Savings bank of Warrenton, N. C.; Fred Kohlbertz & Son, wholesale wines, New York.

Ex-Gov. Talbot prominently mentioned of Massachusetts, declines positively to allow the use of his name.

THE LOWER BERTH.

How the Fat Gentleman Always Secures it.

From the Philadelphia Press.

"It would take a day in the recital, and then fill a big book to tell of the incidents that enter into the daily life of a Pullman car," said J. W. Smittley, resident superintendent of the company in Philadelpia, "and then it would take another and a larger book to contain what hadn't been told." "Are any of these stories true of fat men telling horrible tales about crashing through upper berths in order to secure lower berths!" was asked.

"It is true that facetious heavy weights will tell the stories in the hearing of timid persons," was the reply, "and it is equally untrue that any upper berths ever break down. A well known New York journalist, who tips the beam at 300 pounds—suppose you know him—can be credited with being the originator of that yarn. He loves a joke, and as he is known to almost every palace car porter in the country, manages to carry out the sell very successfully whenever necessary. In case the gentleman reaches the train late and finds the lower berths occupied, he hunts around until he finds a nervous traveler in a place where he would like to be himself. Then he calls the colored porter, and asks him if he has heard any further news of the Rev. Mr. Smith. The porter, who is posted, replies: 'You mean de po' gemman what you mashed dat night you fell froo de berth?' "Yes" replies the ponderous traveler. "I've often thought of that poor man, Jim. I think I broke one of his ribs and one of his arms, didn't I?" "Two ribs and bofe arms, sar," replies Jim solemnly. "And it was somewhere about this side of the car, wasn't it, Jim?" asks the heavy man loudly. "No, sah," says the porter, "you'se thinkin ob de two orphans what you fell on dat night when we was near Buffalo. If you remember, sah, one ob de boys died, and de oder had his eyes squashed. De preacher, sah, was in de upper end ob de car. He wouldn't got outen de lower berth, sah." "Unfortunate fellow," sighs the fat passenger, "and I wasn't as heavy by 50 pounds as I am now, either."

"By this time you can depend that the nervous traveler is getting his pantaloons on. Usually he peeps out, and when he sees the mountain of flesh that is talking, he is more willing to take the upper berth than to run the risk of being crushed to death in the middle of the night. It's a pretty good scheme and generally works to the fat man's satisfaction. As soon as the other fellow finds that a joke has been played upon him he forms the joker's acquaintance and in almost every instance that I've heard, the friendship so strangely made is lasting, because the fat man is one of those jolly good fellows that nobody could stay angry at for more than 10 minutes. There are lots of other incidents that, if strung together, might make a good story, but as life is short and time precious, I think we hed better leave the best ones for another day."

Jonah's Voyage.

St. James' Budget.

Several Continental scientific publications are at present engaged in criticising—not always from a friendly point of view—the history of Jonah. One journal points out that if, as the account may be taken to imply, the fish swallowed the prophet in the Mediterranean and threw him out again near Nineveh, he must have been carried through the Straits of Gibraltar, round the Cape of Good Hope, up the Persian Gulf and into the Tigris. The Acerra Philologica suggests, however a somewhat less unreasonable theory. It considers that there is no ground for believing that Jonah landed near Nineveh, especially as the voyage thither by way of the Cape would have occupied at least three weeks or a month; and it thinks that he was probably cast ashore on the southern shores of the Euxine at a point from which, in about a week, he might have travelled overland to his destination. A fish starting from the neighborhood of Toppa, could no doubt, reach a point in three days and three nights if it swam no faster that a first-rate ocean steamer ordinarily steams now-a-days; and it is well known that many fish can easily move at a very much greater rate of speed.

They all Dropped—to the Joke.

"Pardon me for troubling you, sir, but did you drop a sovereign?" asked a man with an earnest look on his face and a memorandum book in his hand of a well-dressed individual on Ludgate Hill. The man addressed ran his hands nervously into several pockets and replied: "Well now, I declare! Can it be possible that I was so careless as to drop it? Yes, it's gone! I must have lost it here near where we stand." The man opened his memorandum book, took from his vest pocket the stub of a lead pencil, and said, "will you favor me with your name and address?" They were given, and the questioner moved on, when the well-dressed man cried: "Hi, there! Where's the money! Give me my sovereign!" "Oh, I didn't find any money! I took a notion this morning that in a city like this, where thousands and thousands of pounds are handled every hour, there must be great loses, and started out to investigate the matter. Between here and Charing Cross I found seven men who had lost sovereigns, and I expect to run the list up to 200 before I reach the bank. Good day, sir!"

IN LIBBY PRISON.

How a Traitor Was Court Martialled by His Fellow-Prisoners.

A Washington letter to the Philadelphia Record says: Of the six officers of the regular army who found themselves in Libby prison in 1863-4 one was a fine-looking colonel from Indiana—a big-bodied, big-brained, big-hearted fellow, chockfull of energy. He worked like a steam-engine until he got out of Libby. Once he found his tunnel too small for his burly form, once he was checked at the other end of it by two or three armed confederate soldiers, who had been quietly waiting for him; again, a clever ruse was detected just as he got to the middle of the gate, and so it went until he had made half a dozen attempts. But he never gave up, and finally got out, and is now a prospering citizen of Indianapolis, a trifle stouter than when he was in Libby and a good deal richer; but otherwise unchanged. As Uncle Remus says, the colonel's " 'min was allus wukking." After two or three of his attempts to get out of Libby had failed he began to suspect that his failures were caused by treachery in the prisoner's camp. Exchange like kissing went by favor. The colonel after thinking each failure over, came to the conclusion that some poor devil was selling his manhood for a mess of pottage—currying favor which would "exchange" him to his home by betraying the plans of his companions-in-arms to the enemy. He looked about him for the man. Cautious inquiries at length gave him such information as prompted him to say to each of the other five regular army officers: "Meet me at such a spot at midnight, I have found a traitor. We will court-martial him to-night." At midnight the six men met in a dark corner and in whispering voices organized a drum-head court-martial. The colonel presented the name of the suspect and then his proofs. In the ballot that followed each of the six voted "guilty." "Now," said the colonel, "this not a farce. We must vote a sentence, and then we must execute it." "Very well," said the next man. "Well" said the colored colonel, "I vote for death. The wretch deserves it." "So do I," said the next, and so on down to the sixth—a Pennsylvania major. He knew the culprit, a Pennsylvanian like himself, better than the rest. He knew that he was quite capable of the crime charged against him. He had no doubt of his guilt. He wanted to see him punished. He said all this to the other members of the court, and then he added: "But you know we are not a legal court-martial. We have no authority to act—certainly no authority to kill. We may sift the evidence presented against a man for our own satisfaction, but we cannot sentence, much less kill him. The most we can do is to prefer charges against him in the war department. "We can't kill him. ——Suddenly interrupting himself, he said; "Colonel, what's that in your hand?" "The rope," said the colonel grimly; "I've been plaiting it as we talked," and he passed it around. He had taken an old shirt, torn into narrow strips, and woven it into something that looked like a rope. "Now, major," he said, when it was handed back to him, "What you have said is all very well. It does credit to your hearts well as to your head, but you're out-voted; the majority is against you. The sentence of the court is that the scoundrel shall die, and die he will this minute, for I'll kill him myself. "Come, captain," he said to the brawny Irishman next him," you and I will settle the rascal." "Why, you wouldn't strangle him in his sleep, would you?" asked the major, also on his feet as the others moved toward the sleeping form of the traitor. "Certainly," whispered the colonel, "why not? He can't pray, and we can't have any noise." "You never will," said the major, firmly, getting in front of the colonel; "I won't let you—you'll have to kill me first—I won't stand by and see you stain your honest hands with his dishonest blood in such a way as that. Why, man it would be murder. You would be a murderer, I won't permit it." Gliding softly before the rest, he reached the sleeping man, and sat down beside his head. There he sat till the gray morning came stealing in through the chilly atmosphere. Long before that time the colonel and his companions, baffled and disgusted, had stolen away to their sleeping-places, carrying the plaited rope with them. As soon as the major could see the traitor's face in the dim light of the dawn, he waked him and told him all that had occurred. "Now, sir," he said sternly, "I saved your life last night, although I believed you worthy of death. I won't do it again. I saved your life for my sake, not for yours. My advice to you is that as soon as the guard comes in for roll-call you get out of Libby, and as soon as you get to Washington get out of the army. If you're in the army when I get out. I'll prefer charges against you, and if I meet you I'll kill you." Trembling with excitement, the wretch, without a word of denial or palliation, got up, and as soon as the guard came in got out. The stalwart six forwarded charges against him from Libby. When they got out of prison they found him out of the army, so they dropped the matter. The traitor is in the army now, reinstated by act of congress, I believe; but the major who promised to kill him on sight is under the green sod of the prairie. Still, the colonel would make things lively for the traitor if they met face to face.

Death of a Spy.

War glares with moral inconsistencies. A General must know the enemy's plans in order to thwart them. He sends an intelligent man as a spy to discover them. The man goes on his mission, knowing that, necessary as it is, he will be hanged if discovered. The enemy catches him, and in a few hours his dead body dangles from a tree. Across his breast is pined a label: "A warning to spies!"

Yet that same enemy, perhaps, will, twenty-four hours later, send a man to spy out the opposing General's position and plans, and the man will be hung if he is caught. Both Generals need information, and both unite in making death its price.

These thoughts suggested themselves as we read, in "Bullet and Shell," the following description of the death of a spy, who had been caught by one of Custer's officers in a village near Cedar Creek, Virginia:

"What's the matter?" said I to Gen. Custer, who was sitting with his staff round the camp-fire. "You seem sad."

"I have reason to be. I fear we have a disagreeable duty to perform. You know we captured a man in the village."

"Yes. What of him?"

"Only that my adjutant-general has just recognized him as one of the confederate guards who escorted him and other federals when they were taken prisoners. He has gone with two other officers, who were captured at the same time, to see the prisoner."

"You think, then, the fellow is a spy?"

"That's just it; and a dangerous one, too, judging from his looks."

At that moment the three officers came up to make their report.

"Well, gentlemen," said Custer, "what do you think of the prisoner?"

"We all recognized him as one of our old guards," said the adjutant.

"Very well, gentlemen," said Custer, slowly. "The evidence seems to be clear. Adjutant, order the prisoner to be brought before me."

The prisoner was brought up between two sentries. "My man, we think you are a spy," said Gen. Custer, in a quiet voice. "What have you to say to the charge?"

"There's a woman here from the village," replied the man, "and she'll tell you I am her son. I live in the village. Does that make me a spy?"

An elderly woman evidently in some terror came forward.

"Is this man your son?"

"Yes, he is."

"How long has he been in the village?"

"Ever since last spring"

"Does he belong to the southern army?"

"I dunno."

At this moment an orderly handed the adjutant general a bundle and whispered word in his ear. Quietly unrolling it, the adjutant general brought out a confederate uniform.

"General," said he, "this uniform was found in the woman's house where we captured the prisoner."

A sudden flush in the man's face, a swift look of anger, and a glance between him and the woman was the only answer either made to the announcement.

"That will do; remove the woman," said Custer gravely.

The woman gazed for a moment into the face of the prisoner, but it was evident that she was not his mother. She made no effort to bid him farewell.

"My man, its a clear case. You are a soldier of the Confederate army, and inside our lines in disguise. You are therefore a spy. It is my duty to inform you that you must die."

"Die? What! without a trial?" exclaimed the startled prisoner.

"You have just been tried. I, a United States General, have condemned you as a spy. You die at eight to-morrow morning. I will send the chaplain to you, and I hope you will prepare to meet your fate."

At the appointed hour the next morning the poor fellow was brought out and hanged, in the presence of the whole brigade.

A Priceless Diamond.

Mr. Porter Rhodes, the fortunate owner of the priceless diamond that bears his name, is at present in Paris awaiting the result of a competition between two millionaires desirous of possessing the jewel. The stone was found in his mine at Kimberly, South Africa, in the beginning of 1880, and made a great sensation among the diggers when the discovery was made known about four months later. Mr. Porter Rhodes was obliged to satisfy their curiosity by exhibiting the diamond. Accordingly he placed it in a friend's office, charged a sovereign for admission, and in this way received £100 within the first two hours. Altogether he made by the exhibition £500, which he gave to the local hospital. On his arrival in England he was honored with an invitation to Osborne, in order that Her Majesty might inspect the stone. He was afterward taken to Osborne cottage and had an interview with the Empress Eugenie. Mr. Porter Rhodes considers that his diamond as far surpasses the Kohinoor in purity as it does in weight, the Indian stone weighing 106 1-2 carats, the Cape diamond about 150 carats. He said to his interviewer: "I shall have at least fulfilled one mission—I shall have convinced the world that the Cape diamonds are as radiantly pure and blue-white as the Dresden drop and the Braganza. I shall thus upset one popular delusion."

Like an Evil Spirit.

In olden times it was thought that evil spirits came in through cracks and keyholes. The generally approved way to keep them out was to plug up the keyholes and stop the cracks with cotton. Notwithstanding these preventive measures, the evil things had their own way and often came in as they pleased.

So comes malaria now-a-days. We try to keep it out of the keyhole and it comes in by the crack. We stop up the crack, and lo! it comes from a leak in the plumbing, or an opening from some neglected drain, or from some unsuspected source and unguarded direction.

We cannot always keep malaria out, but we can give it battle and drive its effects from our systems. If BROWN'S IRON BITTERS is taken in time, malaria has not a ghost of a chance. This is the great family medicine. Your druggist sells it, and you ought to keep a bottle in the house.

WHY?

Sometimes how near you are,
Sometimes how dear you are;
Then, then, so far, so far,
Like some far star you are.

Sometimes, through you, through you,
I see the gray sky blue,
And feel the warmth of May
In the December day.

Sometimes, sometimes I let
All burdens fall, forget
All cares and every fear;
In your sweet atmosphere.

Then, then, alas, alas!
Why does it come to pass,
Before the hour goes by;
Before my dream doth die.

I drift and drift away
Out of your light of day.
Out of your warmth and cheer,
Your blessed atmosphere?

Why does it come to pass?
Alas, and still alas!
Why doth the world prevail;
Why doth the spirit fail,

And hide itself away
Behind its walls of clay,
Since time began—alas!
Why does it come to pass?
Nora Perry, in Harper's Magazine.

CONRAD'S LOVES.

A great, strapping, muscular, fellow was Conrad Midburger, and he was admitted to be the best dancer and swordsman in the villiage. His complexion was darker than that of most of his neighbors, for there was a tradition of Magyar blood in the family, and his face was by no means lacking an intelligence of a merry and peaceful sort.

The village itself had a look of having been finished long ago; but a "reader of men" might have looked at Conrad, if he saw him there, and said.

"But that fellow's only half done yet. He doesn't half understand himself. Pity there's nothing in this sleepy valley to wake him up."

If, however, the process of waking up was to imply any sort of shaking, there had been little enough of that in the life which Conrad had thus far led. The greatest events of the outside world had been only as storms on the ocean, sending hardly a ripple of their uproar into the little land locked cove of the old, dull village.

Gottlieb Miderburger, Conrad's father with his old crony and partner, Franz Hoferdahl, had made and mended watches in the same dingy and time worn shop where their fathers had filed and hammered before them; and one life was as like another, and about as unvarying as the ticking of the fat-faced timepieces behind the cobwebs in the shop window.

Just now, however, as if the course of nature were being disturbed, various ripples were beginning to come. Rumors there were, for instance, that the king, "God preserve him!" was preparing to fight a war with somebody, and that all young heroes like Conrad Midburger would soon be needed for the army.

Stranger still and utterly unaccountable, considering his time of life, old Franz Hoferdahl had caught the emigration fever, and made up his steadfast mind to join the great German tide that sets perpetually toward the shores of America. Already he had sold whatever he had to sell, except his big pipe, his flute and daughter Christine, for these he intended taking with him to the western Eden.

"Perhaps," thought the villagers, "it's not so strange for old Franz as for some of us. He's been lonely since his wife died, and then he was a great traveler in his younger days."

That was true enough, for Franz Hoferdahl had been even to Berlin and America could not be so very much beyond.

The old man had sold his share in the shop to his friend Gottlieb, and had made as good bargains as he could for his house and movables; but none of his anxious neighbors knew exactly how much of ready cash he took with him when he and his weeping Christine set out upon their long pilgrimage.

Christine wept, indeed, as if she meant to ruin her pretty blue eyes entirely; for the little old village had been very dear to her, and her mother's grave was there. If there were other reasons for her sorrow, Christine kept them to herself, albeit she may have wondered why one person, at least, had not asked her a question or so concerning them.

As for Conrad Midburger, he had said good-bye, with all the rest, to his father's old friend, and to the tearful Christine; and he had rubbed his great black eyes, afterward, in a way that looked as if the whole thing was a good deal of a dream to him. If it was, there was no help for it, since Christine and her father were far enough away before he woke up.

Nevertheless, when Conrad missed, day after day, the accustomed form of old Franz in the shop, as well as the cheery voice of Christine Hoferdahl calling her father home to dinner, the expression of his face would change, at times, and one would almost have said he was beginning to think.

Not quite so much as that, perhaps—at least, not yet; but pretty soon Conrad's eyes took note of a growing difference in the ways and seeming of old Gottlieb Midburger himself. Just what it was would have been hard to say; but, by degrees, the old man came to neglect his pipe, and then his glass of beer, and then his work; and, finally, he took to his bed, and died; and the neighbors said, almost with one accord, that "Franz Hoferdahl had broken his old friend's heart by going away."

"Broken his heart!" said Conrad to himself. "But he did not break mine! And I have a heart, too—I can feel it beat. And I loved old Franz and I loved my father, very much; and I feel as if I could cry all day if I were not so very big a man."

The strongest evidence that Conrad had a heart, however, was yet to come. As the days went by, after his father's death, the shop, and every thing in it ank about it, became utterly distasteful to him. Day after day he sat down by the bench and tried to work; but the very ticking of the watches was insufferably oppressive, while again and again he started up and dropped his file or his hammer in renewed astonishment at the continued absence of those two old men.

"If only Christine would come," he said to himself, "and call old Franz home to dinner!"

But she did not come and the silence and loneliness grew more irksome; and so when, by and by, a good customer opportunely made his appearance, Conrad Midburger almost gladly closed with his offer to purchase the shop and the house. He sold, too, every thing else that his father had left him, except the old man's pipe and sword, and the medal his father before him had won in the old wars with the French. Neither did Conrad, any more than Franz Hoferdahl, tell any of his neighbors how great or how small was the golden store he found himself possessed of; but the Midburgers had been a careful, saving and close-mouthed race for generations.

And when the sales were all completed, and the transfer duly made, and Conrad stood in the moonlight, one fine spring evening, and, gazed at the home that was no longer his, he said to himself:

"I think I could almost break my heart, now, after all, for I did love that house, and I loved the shop; but I could not stay there with the empty places. There were too many voices there that did not speak. That was fit. But what shall I do now?"

Conrad's question was answered for him by the great French Emperor and by the king; for Napoleon had determined in his old age that he must fight the Germans; and so a great many quiet people had to march away from their homes to be shot at, without the wisest man in the village being able to give them a good reason.

It was a sad thing for many, but Conrad Midburger felt as if he was almost glad to go. He was sure he loved his "vaterland," in every bone of his body; and, if the king called for him, he was ready. Still, as they marched away from the sleepy old village, Conrad said to himself:

"There are the old house, and the shop, and the church steeple, and the trees, and the graves in the church yard. I did not know my heart was so big, for I'm sure I love about everything I see."

He could not see any thing very clearly just then, however, for his eyes were strangely dim. No doubt the sun was in them, and the glint and glitter of the bayonets; but, if any one had looked in the young man's face, he might have said:

"It is a very thoughtful face, and there are lines of strength beginning to show in it."

And then there followed swift marching, comfortless camping, all kinds of severe and trying soldier work, and a good deal of very hard fighting. Whatever the newspapers and reports might say about it, Conrad Nidbu rger and his comrades learned that the Frenchmen were brave fellows, and that the glory of beating them was never very cheaply won.

Being big and strong and brave, a good swordsman, and every day growing more and more intelligent, Conrad himself won glory—that is, three or four slight wounds, a medal, promotion from the ranks, the compliments of his commanding officer, and the envy of his comrades.

Being a man of property, of respectable parentage, of fair education, Conrad might have looked forward to almost anything attainable in the German army by a man of less than noble blood, if the war had not been so very brief, and if the corps to which he belonged had not been among the first to be ordered home. Before a great while be found himself almost his own master again, though still within the scope and control of army regulations, for no German of Conrad's age is ever beyond them, and he said to himself, "Well, I love the army, I almost loved fighting. I knew I could love glory with all my heart. I know I am ten times as much a soldier as that little white mustached ape of a baron that commanded my company. That is it. I think I could love a country where there were no barons. Let me see. I think my heart must have been growing a good deal during this war. There is more room in it than I know of, and yet it is always full. I think there are some things in it that I never saw there in the old times. I will go and take a look at the village first, and the house and the shop, and I will listen again to see if I can hear Christine call her father home to dinner. Then, if I don't hear her, what then? Well, I will just ask my heart about it."

Now all this time, old Franz Hoferdahl and his daughter had known very little of what had taken place in the village they left behind them. They found their pilgrimage long and weary enough, and they had reached a resting place at last, and they had written home to their old neighbors, as all Germans do, but very little information had come back to them. They knew that old Gottlieb Midburger was dead, and that Conrad had given up the home and the shop, and that he had gone to the great war with the French, and that was nearly all.

Franz Hoferdahl had not landed on the shores of the new world a pauper in any thing but youth and strength, and he found friends readily enough to take the place of the old ones as far as might be, and, after he had got over his first daze and bewilderment, and become somewhat accustomed to the racking changes in all his habits and ways of life he tried to settle down as a man of property and substance, and be happy.

"If only old Gottlieb Midburger were with me," he said to Christine, "I think I could do it, I would give a good deal just to see the old fellow lay down his pipe and look into a dirty watch."

Christine said very little, but her bright American home became dreary enough at times, when she shut her eyes and let her thoughts go back to the old sleepy German village. She read all the accounts of the great war, too, wondering if any of her old neighbors had been in this battle or that, and she listened very silently when her father said:

"If Conrad Midburger was in any of that fighting, I'll be bound he behaved himself well. There's good blood in the Midburger's and Conrad is a fine boy."

"He must be a man by this time," said Christine.

And then she thought what a very tall fine looking man he must be, and how well he would appear in his uniform.

But when after awhile, there was news of peace, and they heard that the army was going home to be disbanded, old Franz Hoferdahl grew strangely thoughtful, and Christine tried all in vain to arouse him, or amuse him, until, one autumn morning, he said to her:

"All the other old soldiers are going home, I think it is pretty near time for me to go, too."

"To Germany, father?" exclaimed Christine, with a sudden light in her eyes. "Oh father!"

"No, Christine," solemnly replied the old man; "Germany is not the only fatherland. I am a very old soldier and I think this is my last campaign."

Christine understood him then, but all in a dreamy and unreal sort of a way, until, a few weeks later, she found herself sitting alone in the house, while the chilling wind that whistled by the windows was freighted with the first white harbingers of the winter. It seemed a cold, forlorn, and empty sort of a world to Christine, and when she tried to think of the village where she was born, that, too, seemed empty and deserted, and she imagined the old shop shut up and the snowflakes beating against the webbed windows.

The door bell rang, but Christine did not hear it, nor did she know the servant had admitted any body, until she was conscious of a heavy step, almost beside her, and a deep, clear voice, full of manly strength, but that trembled in a thrilling musical way said to her.

"Christine! Christine!"

She looked up then in the face—a scarred and war-bronzed face—of a tall, erect, noble looking man, and whose large, dark, penetrating eyes were absolutely radiant as they looked down into her own.

"Christine," he said again, "do you understand me? I have come."

"He had come!" she thought for one burning moment; and it seemed as if light, life and happiness and strength and the old German home itself had come with him. She now had an odd quick fancy that the door of the old shop opened and the sun began to shine and she could see the two old men at their work, but she arose and threw her arms around his neck and only said between her sobs: "Conrad, I'm so happy! so glad you have come!"

It was a sober day and a sober meeting, after all, but some hours later, as they sat by the grate in the parlor where the fire burned warm and cheerily, while the first merry snowflakes of the opening winter flitted softly by the windows, and they exchanged stories of all that had happened to them, Conrad said to her:

"Ah, Christine, I did not know myself when you went away. I did not know I had a heart, but I soon began to find it out. I found that it was a great, big heart, too, with wonderful things in it. One love after another seemed to wake up and speak to me, to tell me it was there, until at last the biggest love of all came to life, and it grew and grew till it crowded out all the others and filled up every thing, and then I had to come across the ocean to find you. But who would have dreamed that you had kept any thing for me, waiting all this time for me to come? I was terribly afraid about that."

"Oh, I don't know," said Christine. "I don't understand it at all. All the while it has seemed as if I were only waiting—waiting—and that if I waited long enough you would surely come."

"And here I am," said Conrad, "only I think there's a good deal more of me, somehow, than in those dear old sleepy days at home"

Some Causes of Headache.

Derangements of the heart and digestive apparatus are quite common causes of pain in the head. Headache is also provoked by changes in other organs quite distant from the head. A characteristic headache is that in which the pain is felt most severely upon the top of the head. Reflex headache is a very good name for this pain. The way in which heart troubles cause headache is purely mechanical. An enlarged heart or one temporarily overexcited from some cause pumps an undue quantity of blood into the cranial cavity, which is an unyielding space. The unusual amount of blood now present in this space pressing upon the sensitive parts of the brain produces a pain in the head which is called a congestive headache. This pain is made worse by any excitement or by stooping, a fact that helps to indicate the nature of the case. The pain felt in the head after unusual libation and also after some undue mental effort is probably of this nature.

Headache from derangement of the digestive apparatus is probably the most frequent of all. Atrocious headaches these are. They generally happen like this: the victim rises from bed in the morning feeling a trifle off, with perhaps a sense of uneasiness in the stomach and a slight pain in one temple. As the day advances the pain in the head and general distress increase, and by afternoon the individual reckons that his head is fit to burst and doesn't care very much if it would do so; presently an attack of vomiting and perhaps a slight diarrhœa occurrs, and then the pain gradually disappears, to return again, however, when the necessary conditions are present for its existence. These are the typical headaches, some of the victims of which declare they have inherited the trouble. There is considerable likeness between the condition just described and sea-sickness.

The pain in the head very usually coincident with the onset of some febrile complaints is a very good example of headache from general systematic conditons. In this case the circulation of vitiated blood probably provokes pain, neuralgic in character. Individuals who have inherited strongly marked nervous tendencies and who from any cause may be in poor general health are very liable to have pain shooting up through the temples and back of the head. These pains are often followed by soreness of the scalp. They also are neuralgic in character, and are especially obstinate in the aged. Coincident plumbic (lead) or malarial poisoning increases the susceptibility of individuals to these pains.—Philadelphia Times.

Why Sunday is a "Good Thing."

You sleep late on Sunday morning, after the toils of the week; and that is perhaps right. You rise to a day of leisure and enjoyment; and it is proper enough to make Sunday a day of enjoyment. You go to the house of God; and it is very charming to hear the music. You are intellectually fed: and there is great pleasure in that. If the discourse is highly adorned, on taking your leisurely walk home you say: "It was very well put. It was rather an ingenious argument. I do not know as I ever heard those ideas expressed just in that way before. The peroration was eloquent. We have a minister now that is worth listening to. I enjoy myself in church very much." You sleep through the night, and rise Monday morning feeling, "What a good thing Sunday is!" But you plunge into the world; and there is the same selfishness in it that there was before. "Men are good, bad, and indifferent," you say; "I must attend to myself; I must protect myself against this one; I must overbear that one if he stands in my way." So you go tearing here, hitting there, smiting in every direction, rushing one way and another like a civilized lion among children, leaving destruction behind you, with or without provocation as the case may be. —[H. W. Beecher.

The Bride.

From the Home Journal.

Thou dear Lenette! A bride is indeed for many days, to every one who does not marry her, and especially to me, a poor meagre shew-bread, but I expect one hour, the hour on the morning of the wedding day, when the hitherto free girl, trembling in her finery, overgrown with flowers and feathers, soon with like ones to be plucked out by destiny; with anxious, pious eyes, which for the last time and the lovelist, shed their tears on the mother's bosom; when standing adorned on the scaffolding of joy she celebrates so many partings and one sole meeting; and when the mother turns away from her and goes to her other children, abandoning the anxious girl to a stranger; this hour, I say, touches me.

Thou joyfully throbbing heart, I then think, not always wilt thou beat thus in thy sultry years of married life; but often wilt thou shed thine blood that thou mayest more freely step down the path that leads to old age, even as the chamois hunters support themselves by the blood of their heels. Then do I feel tempted to go out to the virgins who stand by the wayside that leads to the church, looking on with envious eyes, and say to them: "Do not grudge the poor girl so much the rapture of a perhaps fleeting delusion. Ah! like her ye see to-day the beauty and strife-apple of marriage hanging only on the sunny side of love, so red and so soft, but green sour side, hidden by the shade, no one sees. And if ye have ever pitied from the bottom of your heart an unfortunate wife who chanced ten years after marriage, to pull out of a drawer her old bridal dress, while all the tears which she had shed in those ten years over her sweet delusion pressed into her eyes at once, do ye then know so surely that it will be otherwise with the envied one who now flits past you so gayly and so brightly?

FARM AND HOUSE.

Miscellaneous Recipes.

Toliet Soap.—One, and one-fourth gallons clear water, five pounds of white soap, one-quarter of a pound of sal soda two tablespoonfuls alcohol, two tablespoonfuls of ammonia, one tablespoonful of turpentine, one tablespoontul camphene, one tablespoontul powdered borax. Shave the soap fine, then boil altogether until dissolved. If, after it is not hard enough, melt again. Make it any form you please. Color with Chinese vermillion.

Furniture Oil.—Take one pint of linseed oil one-half ounce of gum arabic in lump, one ounce of shellac varnish. Put in a bottle, stand by the fire for a week, then strain.

To Whiten the Hands.—Rub the hands every night with a mixture of one ounce of camphor gum and one ounce of glycerine. Melt, and when thoroughly mixed set away to cool.

To Color Scarlet.—Boil one pound of Nicaragua wood for three hours: then add one-half pound of alum. Let the goods remain in the dye one hour.

To Polish Copper.—Heat a teacup of vinegar and one tablespoon of salt. Apply hot with a flannel cloth, and rub till dry.

To Clean Mirrors.—Mix whiting with water till about as thick as paste; apply with a flannel cloth and rub off when dry.

To Clean Tinware.—The best thing for cleaning tinware is common soda, rub the ware briskly, after which, wipe dry.

To Clean Cut Glass.—Having washed cut-glass articles, let them dry, and afterwards rub them with prepared chalk and a soft brush, carefully going into all the cavities.

Indelible Ink.—To one tablespoonful of rain water, one-half teaspoon of vinegar, and a piece of lunar caustic three inches long; shake well together, put on to your cloth a little milk and soda, to a tablespoon of milk, a piece of baking soda as large as a grain of corn; iron smooth, and write immediately.

Iron Rust.—This may be removed by salt mixed with a little lemon juice; put in the sun; if necessary use two applications.

Farming Notes.

It is claimed for the Holsteins that they combine milk, cheese, butter and beef far more successfuly than any other breed—that they are pre-eminently the cattle for the millions.

Castor oil plants possess certain disagreeable qualities which are concentrated in the seed. Until the seeds are formed the leaves retain the acrid poisonous character. It is said that moles will leave a place where castor-oil plants are grown; chinch bugs will not pass among them to ravage corn or wheat, and flies will not stay in a room where they are growing. We cannot personally vouch for any of these statements, excepting as regards the oil of the seeds.

Colts are subject to weakness of the knee or stifle joint, which is really the knee-joint and corresponds to that joint in mankind, Young animals of all kinds are thus troubled for want of sufficient nutrition. Usually they grow out of it in time if well treated. The treatment is to supply the most nutritious food. A colt should have oats as much as it will digest, and a yearling will take two or three quarts a day after gradually becoming used to them. Begin with a quart daily and increase gradually a quart a week until three quarts are given.

It would seem that whatever is good for a state is good for the individual farmer; that on suitable land, the climate favoring, it is best to raise mixed crops. But though the rule is a good one, still, if a farm will not raise corn, but is suitable for fruit or grazing, or something else, then, by all means, follow that industry for which the soil is best adapted for there are exceptions to all rules.

There is more merit in the common cows of the country than they get credit for. Give them the same pampering that the thoroughbreds get, and the thoroughbreds the scanty, bare and hard treatment the common stock get, and a few generations will suffice to bring them both to the same level. The thoroughbreds are what they are from good food and good treatment.

Farmers' Boys and Girls.

The Breeder's Gazette says: The care and training of his young stock is properly recognized as the most important and difficult part of the breeder's work, and after all the most important "animals" on the farm are the boys and girls. It is not our province to suggest the importance of seeing that the children of farmers get a good training, for on the intelligence of the next generation of farmers and breeders will success depend more largely than on any other one thing. A few months schooling in winter was once counted enough. It certainly is not now. Thousands of farmers' boys labor under serious disadvantages in the common and more advanced schools because the pressure of work at home has been thought a sufficient reason for not permitting them to commence attendance at the opening of the fall sessions. There is more recognition of the need of special education for the farmer than was found a few years ago. Our agricultural colleges still have more critics than scholars. They lack many things; chief of all they lack students who want to be farmers. There is not one of them at which a young man may not obtain a good education; and many of them have admirable facilities for "teaching the branches relating to agriculture"—better facilities than would have been dreamed of 25 years ago.

Another Great Strawberry.

New Jersy has of late years become quite noted for producing new varieties of the strawberry. The late Seth Boyden showed his neighbors what could be done in the way of raising new varieties from seed, as well as how to produce berries of immense size by the use of highly stimulating manure, and they have not forgotten the lesson, at least we think not, judging from the scores of new varieties that are annually announced as having been raised in New Jersey. Every new one is, as a matter of business, pronounced to be far ahead of all its illustrious predecessors, and the latest novelty is announced under the high-sounding name of "Prince of Berries," and although it has never been tried outside of the originator's grounds, he is confident that it will be successful "in all sections under the variations of soil, climate, &c." In the description of this new variety, the originator makes it out the most perfect thing ever known in the way of a strawberry; but as we have heard such stories before, that did not prove to be true, we put very little confidence in this one.—New York Sun.

The Wheat Crop.

The Agricultural Department, or rather, Mr. Dodge, the Statistican there-of estimates our home consumption of wheat at 250,000,000 bushels for bread and 50,000,000 bushels for seed, so that of the wheat crop of 1883 there will be an exportable surplus of 89,550,000 bushels, according to the Miller's National Association: 125,000,000 bushels according to the Department of Agriculture: 140,000,000 according to the Cincinnati Price Current, and 143,000,000 according to Bradstreet's. To the exportable surplus from this year's crop should be added at least 50,000,000 bushels of former crops still constituting the "visible supply" or in the hands of the producers bread enough for ourselves in any case and some to spare for poor old hungry Europe!

Underdraining—Its Advantages.

To understand how it is beneficial we must consider some of the characteristics of the soil and the requirements of successful plant growth. The late John H. Klippart, an authority on drainage, condensed the advantages of tile drainage under 12 heads: 1. "The drainage removes stagnant waters from the surface." No soil can produce useful crops when it is covered or its surface permanently saturated with water. In wet seasons clay lands hold the rainfall in the lowest places, and when it finally evaporates the crop is destroyed and the surface is baked and hard. This evaporation also uses a great amount of heat which would otherwise warm the soil. We see, therefore, that if the water that falls upon the soil remains until removed by evaporation, all the heat which should be making the soil warm is being wasted in evaporating the water. One experimenter made a number of tests in two adjoining fields, one drained the other undrained. The average temperature of the soil in the field that had been drained was 6 1-2 degrees higher than in the other. This is another reason why drainage enables the earlier cultivation of a field and lengthens the season; the ground becomes warm so much earlier in the Spring and remains warm later in the fall.

2. "It removes surplus water from under the surface."

The best condition of the soil for successful plant growth is found when the particles of the soil are moist, but when there is no standing water among these particles. In wet seasons, if no adequate means are provided for removing the excess of moisture that falls upon the soil, it will be continually saturated, and the crops will be as surely drowned out as though water appeared on the surface. Again, if the soil be full of water that which falls upon it in rain must flow off over the surface, carrying with it much of the best and finest of the soil. Water standing in the soil causes the vegetable matter to undergo acetic fermentation, thus rendering the soil sour and unfit for cultivation. The freezing out of winter grain is oftener than from any other cause produced by the formation of ice in the upper part of the soil, which throws out the plant and leaves it to perish. With good drainage the soil would be dry when it was time for freezing, and what is called "heaving" would not occur. 3. "It lengthens the seasons." Often the yield of a crop depends greatly on the time it can be put in the ground. A few days' difference in sowing may make much in yield. The work can be better and more economically done because there is more time to do it. If land is drained it can be more thoroughly pulverized, and be in better condition for nourishing the growing crops. Air in the soil is necessary as well as moisture, but it cannot penetrate the baked surface.

On drained lands the plants will send their roots deeper into the soil. When a plant begins to grow in the spring in an undrained soil the roots will not penetrate into the cold lower soil filled with water, but run along through a few inches of the drier surface. When the dry weather comes the sun completely dries this out and the plant having no other supply stops growing. On land that has been underdrained in the condition described as most favorable for plant growth, moist but with no standing water between the particles the plant sends its roots far and deep. When the sun of summer dries the ground the plant has communication with the cool moist soil far below.

The remainder of Mr. Klippert's points condensed most of which we have touched upon are: It deepens the soil. It warms the soil. It equalizes the temperature of the soil during the season of growth. It carries down soluble substances to the roots of plants. It prevents heaving and freezing out. It prevents injury from drought. It improves quality and quantity of the crop. It increases the effect of manures. It prevents rust in wheat and rot in potatoes.

Repairing a Lofty Lightning Rod.

From the Baltimore American.

Quite a crowd collected in the neighborhood of Baltimore and Front streets yesterday shortly after midday, and the gaze of each and every one was directed heavenward. Following the line of their observations, two figures could be seen on top of the shot tower. The height was necessarily too great to distinguish the countenances of the areial excursionists, and when one of them climbed the flag-staff which tops the tower, went through queer movements, and then rapidly descended, excitement was at its height. The crowd increased momentarily, and from many windows in the lower section of the city which commanded a view of the lofty elevation curious persons gazed upon the two figures. Presently both disappeared inside of the tower, and the show was over. An American man went over to the tower and ascertained that Mr August L. Eicke, in company with a colored man, one of his employes, had been busy fixing up the lightning rod attached to the tower and doing similar lofty work. Mr. Eicke said: "This tower is 217 feet high, and it takes 394 ordainary stair steps to reach the top. The flag-staff is 35 feet high in addition, and to-day I put my lightning rod glasses on the staff and renewed the flag halyards. The flag-staff is only about eight inches in diameter at the base, and when I climbed up it shook like a willow. I would have remained up longer and completed more work, but to-day, like every other sultry day the air at high altitudes is full of electric currents and they became so strong at one time that I was compelled to slip down the pole a distance of more than six feet, and thus, as you see, lacerated and cut my hands. It is much warmer up there than it is down here, and I was in a profuse perspiration all the time. To-morrow I shall continue my work, which will occupy me two or three days, and finally I will come down the lightning rod outside of the tower and repair any defects I may see."

After some delay caused by the cutting of telegraph wires since the road was completed the first car has been run over the Brooklyn bridge. The trip was successful, but some time will elapse before the public will be accommodated.

THE CONSEQUENCE.

Tom Dunton? He's the best young man in town;
At least so everybody seems to think.
He's never known to swear or smoke, or drink;
On cards and billiards he is said to frown,
He never saw a horse-race in his life;
He doesn't dance because he thinks it wrong,
Immoral quite, for one to glide along
With arms about another fellow's wife.
The theater he shuns. He wouldn't go
Even Italian opera to hear,
Because the ballet-dancers would appear
In dresses which their lower limbs would show.
In short, his life in nothing can afford
Even the faint suspicion of a vice;
He truly is exceptionally nice.
But see! He cometh! Now we shall be bored! —Life.

IN THE HORNET'S NEST.

A Sergeant's Story of the Civil War,

His Experience at the Battle of Shiloh and Recollections of the Eventful Day—The Surrender of Prentiss.

Gibhart Kurts, sergeant of Company K, of the Eighteenth Missouri, writes to the Detroit Free Press:

I was in Company K, Eighteenth Missouri, center brigade, consisting of the Sixteenth and Eighteenth Wisconsin, Eighteenth Missouri and Captain A. Hickenlooper's Ohio battery. The right brigade consisted of the Twelfth Michigan, Twenty-first and Twenty-fifth Missouri. There were two regiments on our left, the Fifteenth Michigan and Sixty-first Illinois. This constituted Gen. Prentiss' division at Shiloh. Our brigade were camped apart, but in line of the front, and there was an open space of about a quarter of a mile between our brigade and the one on our right. On Saturday, the day before the fight Gen. Prentiss had received information that the enemy had been seen by our scouting parties in small detachments and that same afternoon Gen. Prentiss had ordered out five companies of the Twenty-first Missouri, under Col. Moore, of the right brigade and two companies from Wisconsin regiment, center brigade; one company Sixty-first Illinois on our left, to strengthen the picket and outposts in our front. One company Eighteenth Missouri was to hold itself in readiness if called on during the night. Early on the next Sunday morning before sunrise we heard firing off in the direction of our right brigade camps. Soon an officer rode rapidly through our camp to Col. Madison Miller's tent and in an instant we heard the command, fall in, fall in, and the long role was beat and the bugles sounded. Our regiment and brigade were soon in line and loaded our guns and marched rapidly across the large open field in our front. At this time we could hear the firing more briskly and the same time we could see our pickets fighting and falling back through the woods in our front. They soon came out of the woods, some helping their wounded comrades, and passed to the rear, saying that the woods were full of rebels, and that they had killed some of our boys. Our regiment and brigade were soon in line of battle and our Col. Madison Miller rode down in front of our line, giving orders to keep cool and to shoot low. We could hear the bullets then already, whizzing through the air. At the same time the enemy came in sight in heavy force, with their guns shining in the morning sun. Col. Miller in an instant wheeled his horse to the rear and gave the command to fire, and we sent a withering volley into their advancing columns and the fight was on with us, and there we stood fighting while our own officers and comrades were falling fast around us. In a short time six of our officers received their mortal wounds on this line namely: Adjt. Edgar, Capts. Clark, Cooper and Godfrey, and Lieut. Dayton and Sharp. We fought here until the enemy were coming in our right flank through the open gap between our brigade camps and line of battle, We were ordered to fall back, and right here is where the first confusion took place, as we got scattered. Some would load as they went and turn and fire, and some of the command made a stand in our camp. The enemy did not follow us, but first cautiously advanced to the edge of the woods and ran back again, but they soon came out with their flags and advanced in squads. They would advance a short distance and lie down. I was shooting at them from behind a tree in our camp. All at once I heard a rush coming down through the Wisconsin camp on the right and rear, and turning around I saw a red flag and an officer in gray; that was enough for me in close quarters, and did not stop to look for more, and we took to our heels, and coming out to an open place I saw Gen. Prentiss rapidly riding in the direction of the Sixty-first Illinois and Fifteenth Michigan that were still in line yet off on to our left, and with waving his cap he was cheering them to hold their ground, but he could not stem the tide as the enemy were soon on them in heavy force and they wavered and then also fell back. A part of General Prentiss' command re-formed again along the roadside in the rear of some troops that were lying down behind a rail fence, in an open place. At about this time 8 o'clock, the enemy had got possession of our camp and were helping themselves to our breakfast and commissary stores, and there was a stop in the fight on this part of the field. Gen. Prentiss' command had been fighting the enemy from about 5 a. m. up to this time, counting in the right brigade—first, Col. Moore with his five companies in the advance until it had extended to us on our left, and had lost heavily in officers and men. Col. Moore, Twenty-first Missouri, lost his leg; Col. Peabody, Twenty-fifth Missouri, was killed; Col. Allen, Sixteenth Wisconsin, had his horse shot from under him. We lost our adjutant and five officers, not counting those that were wounded and re-covering again. After we had re-formed we marched into the fight again under General Prentiss in connection with Gen. W. H. Wallace's troops that had come up from the landing. We marched out near the [illegible] and rapidly threw [illegible] up with our skirmishers and got possession of an old worn out road that ran just right for our line of battle and answered well for breastworks, and every soldier recognized the advantage of the position by lying down in it as soon as they reached there without orders, and a section of a battery soon took position upon our right and we were ready to receive the enemy and were not kept waiting long. We soon heard cheering at a distance in our front and the battery in position on our right commenced firing. The cheering was afterwards called the "rebel yell" (that we often heard as we afterwards came to in the Atlanta campaign under Gen. Sherman, in the Army of the Tennessee), and we soon knew that the enemy was coming to attack us in heavy force, and as soon as they got close enough to us we fired low into their advancing lines. They would stop, and all would lie down and rise and fire. They would fight awhile but we were killing their men too fast, and they could not stand it long under such a heavy fire of musketry and cannon, and would fall back leaving their wounded among their dead in our front, and we could plainly hear their cries, and there they would lie until they would be exposed to our cruel fire in the next assault. After the second repulse a Sergeant of my regiment went into the thick underbrush in our front, and returned bringing a red military cap, sword and belt, and stated that the woods was full of dead and wounded confederates.

At intervals between the assaults the officers would ride along the line, cheering the men to hold their ground, saying that General Lew Wallace and his division would soon be up from their camps at Crump's Landing, only six miles away, where he saw them as we came up the river on the boats. This fighting was kept up for about six hours, and we repeated the enemy with heavy loss, until about 5 p. m., when General Prentiss was cut off and surrounded, and was compelled to surrender. This position was afterward called by the confederates the Hornet's Nest, where they lost so many of their brave officers and men, including their commander-in-chief, General Albert Sidney Johnston, in trying to take, and where also our gallant General W. H. Wallace was killed in defending, and of this gallant general and his brave command M. Quad makes no mention at all in his account of the battle. Colonel Tyndall, of the Twenty-third Missouri, was also reported killed at this place. I received a small compliment in the shape of a bullet from the Confederates at this place, called the Hornet's nest.

This is the Confederate description of the Hornet's Nest, described by Col. Johnson: "This position of the Federals was occupied by Gen. W. H. Wallace's division, and the remainder of Gen. Prentiss' and other commands. Here behind a dense thicket, on the crest of a hill, was posted a strong body of as hardy troops as ever fought, almost perfectly protected by the conformation of the ground, and by logs and other rude and hastily-prepared defenses. To assail it an open field had to be passed, enfiladed by the fire of batteries. It was nicknamed by the Confederates the Hornet's Nest. No figure of speech would be too strong to express the deadly peril of assault upon this natural fortress, whose inaccessible barrier blazed for six hours with a sheet of flames of shot and shell musket fire, which no living thing could quell or even withstand. At last Gens. Wallace and Prentiss were pressed on all sides by assailants. Then Prentiss formed the gallant resolve to charge and drive back the attacking forces. But just at that moment an overwhelming rush swept Gen. Wallace's command away killing that brave and devoted officer, and Prentiss, surrounded on all sides, was forced to surrender, with 3,000 men of his at about 5 p. m. The battle may be said to have closed. Of this divison it has been said that it had received the first blow in the morning, and made the last organized resistance in the evening (on that line). Gen. Johnston fell at the very hour when loss of a commander-in-chief cannot be supplied. Gen. Beauregard, next in rank, could not, in the short time allowed to sufficiently familiarize himself with the situation to make the necessary disposition and give the proper orders. So those last two hours of daylight were left unimproved."

Passing Events.

A correspondent writes to London Nature that "Kentish men who drink chalked water are large-boned, while those people who drink soft water are the reverse. At Glasgow, where the water is supposed to be very soft, there are said to be more bandy-legged children than at any other place."

The Cleveland Leader exhumes a letter written from Ohio to England in 1833, wherein the writer states that large turkeys cost 50 cents each, chickens 12 1-2 cents, mutton, beef, veal and pork 4 cents a pound at retail or 2 and 2 1-2 at wholesale, butter from 9 to 12 1-2 cents and cows from $10 to $25. That was pleasant for the buyers with cash, but the trouble was there was no cash circulating, as the writer adds that frequently men owning good farms and plenty of live stock were for weeks and months without even a cent. On the whole the present state of affairs seems to be preferable.

The Maryland doctor who some time ago, earned the title of the champion litigant, is still in the field trying to beat his own record. It is noted in the Baltimore Sun that on Aug. 6, he caused to be issued 703 summonses, for $98 each, against the Adams express company, 171 for $100 each, and $80 for $98 each, against a flour merchant named Shriner, and $250 for $98 each against another party, This gives a total of 1204 summonses. It is an expensive amusement, but so far the litigious doctor has had the fun of paying the bills all to himself.

American watering places are thus classified by the New York Graphic as to specialities of the summer residents: Newport—English celebrities and their American imitators. Saratoga—Politicians, musicians and sportsmen. Long Branch—Actors, actresses and railroad kings. The Adirondacks, Mount Desert and the Isle of Shoals—College dignitaries, authors and authoresses. Long Beach—Pagan Bob Ingersoll. Coney Island—The dear people.

A Brooklyn doctor ridicules the prevailing fashion of bundling babies up in summer. He said: "With a regard for these three points—diet, clothing and air (the first two limited, the last unrestricted)—scarcely a decently healthy-born babe would die or even become sick. There would be no diarrhœa nor other ailments. The natural and only speedy and safe cure for diarrhœa is to stop the food. The cause is indigestion. To continue turning down food is to continue the irritation. At once, stop all food. A day of absolute fasting, giving fresh cool water as often as the patient desires, will end satisfactorily almost any case of diarrhœa, with no cost or danger from drugs.

In exemplification of the modern naming of towns, villages or cross-roads the Boston Advertiser says: "The railways became the first great co-operative name-giver of the country, and then a forlorn succession of attempts at a revival of earlier days was begun. Men in dirty city offices pining for fresh air and a glimpse of mountains and meadows, sprinkled fair-sounding names with almost wanton freedom along railroad lines that they had never traversed. The termination, vale, bridge, crossing, valley, and land coupled with the name of a tree forms one of the commonest kinds of city-made names."

It appears that the big East River Bridge, connecting New York and Brooklyn, is not high enough above the water to allow the tallest-masted vessels to pass underneath without damage. Last evening when the ship Henry S. Sanford was being towed under the bridge her fore-top-gallant and main-top-gallant masts were broken off by coming in contact with the cables. The bridge is reported to have settled about two feet since last winter.

SPIRITUAL ART.

Within the hush of some tree-hidden bower,
Beneath the somber breaking of the day,
In soft deaf grace Eve's tender body lay
Till God gave spirit to complete her dower.
Then burst the opening bud to perfect flower,
Then flesh woke manifest from pallid clay,
Then voice and life and movement marked the ay
Of som divine impenetrating power.

So in these latter days our English art
Like Mother Eve lay fair yet deadly numb,
Till God's own breath aroused her from the trance,
And—giving speech to her who yet was dumb—
Mated to outward grace the better part,
The soul of rich and high significance.

THE CLINK OF GOLD.

It was a winter night. I was sitting over the fire at my chambers in the Middle Temple, and my friend, Frank Bowser, was pacing about the room.

"Arthur," said he, stopping suddenly and tossing a bag of gold toward the ceiling, "I shall soon claim the hand of Alice Darell now."

Again he pitched the bag of gold into the air, and the pieces of money, clinking together, sent forth a low ringing sound.

"Bowser," said I, drawing my arm-chair closer to the fire, "this is a dangerous scheme. It will end in disaster. Take my advice and don't pursue it further."

In the old college days Bowser had gained a reputation for recklessness, and he had not changed in character since. As I expected, his answer was a laugh.

His inflexibility irritated me.

"Can you not realize," I exclaimed, "what a risk you are running? You go out nearly every night on this strange search. You take no precaution that I know of. The day must come, though I dread to think of it, when you will be robbed, and probably murdered."

"Murdered?" said Bowser, laughing, and still tossing his gold. "How nervous you are to-night. Nonsense! My plan will succeed. I am hunting about the docks, at Limehouse, now; and if you only knew what a discovery—hello! what's that?"

It was a muffled, mysterious sounding knock at the outer door.

"It's Scroggie," said I, jumping up. "Old Scroggie!"

"Ah! Scroggie, is it?" said Browser. "Ah!"

A change crossed his face, I thought. But possibly I was mistaken; for there was no light in the room, except a shaded lamp and the uncertain flicker of the fire, which threw shadows upon our faces as well as upon the dark panelled walls.

I went out to admit my visitor. As I walked along the passage I could hear the ring of Bowser's gold; I felt a chill pass over me, and I shuddered.

"Alone?" said Scroggie in a low voice as I opened the door.

"Come in," I said; "come in, it's only Bowser."

He hesitated with his hands deep in his pockets. Then he hugged himself, as if suffering from cold, and said.

"No. I'll look in later—"

"Not you!" said I, taking him playfully by the coat collar (we were familiar in our manners toward each other). "Not you? I'm going to give Bowser a lecture, and I want an audience. So come and take the chair."

As I still held him by the collar, and refused to release him, Scroggie, after a slight resistance, yielded to persuasion. So I shut out the cold air on the staircase and led the way into my cosy room.

"Good evening," said Bowser, throwing up his bag and catching it. "Good evening, Scroggie. I'm practicing at a little game. You'll excuse me. Our friend Field," he added, turning to me, "our friend Field will tell you all about it. It's music to me. Sweet music."

"I hate the sound of gold," said Scroggie, seating himself by the fire with another mug and turning his back on Bowser. "It reminds me of the diggings. And at 'Frisco I used to hear that clinking all day long. I hate it."

He spoke in a low voice, with his eyes fixed resentfully on the bright coals.

"Now, Bowser," said I, when I had mixed a glass of whisky for Scroggie and had resumed my seat by the fire, "now, Bowser, put that bag of gold into your pocket and listen to me. I am going to explain your scheme to Scroggie, and show him how very unsatisfactory I consider your conduct. Now, Bowser, for goodness sake, sit down."

Bowser bestowed upon me a half-amused, half-impatient glance, and giving his bag a parting toss, dropped it into his pocket, and sat down away from the fire in the shade, beyond the reading lamp, and with his arms folded on the table. He was a large, powerful man; and I remember thinking how gigantic his shoulders looked in that semi-darkness, as he leaned forward to listen.

"The facts of the case," said I—"the facts of the case are somewhat as follows. My learned friend has fallen in love, if I am not mistaken—"

Bowser nodded.

"Has fallen in love with a young lady named Darell—" I thought Scroggie had spoken. He had started and muttered something, beyond a doubt, when I mentioned the name of Darell.

"Nothing," said Scroggie, returning with a quick glance the inquiring look which I gave him.

"And moreover," I then resumed, "if I am not mistaken, my learned friend and Miss Darell are engaged."

Again Bowser nodded.

"But," I said—"but there is a clause in the engagement. Miss Darrell has lost her father, who met with his death under circumstances of a very painful nature. In a word, Miss Darell's father was murdered."

At this moment I happened to be looking straight at Scroggie, and a dark shadow seemed to gather over his face. The expression startled me, and vanished.

"Stay!" said Bowser as I was about to continue. "Let me tell the story as I heard it from Alice Darell."

I said, "By all means;" and, leaning back in my chair, I waited for Bowser to proceed.

"Miss Darell's father," said Frank Bowser, "was chief cashier at a bank in a large market town in the North of England. He lived on the premises, and his daughter Alice lived with him. His position was an arduous one. He was frequently engaged over the cash, or in examining the ledgers, until late into the night; especially on evenings preceeding market days. It was part of his duty to weigh, or count over and check off in the bullion book, the various bags of gold, large and small, before they were handed over, or distributed among the cashiers. And so, night after night, the click of gold might be heard in the iron room beyond the back parlor, for night after night Mr. Darell sat there weighing the gold in the scales, or counting it, or shoveling it into the bags, clink—clink—clink."

Here Bowser paused, and taking his own bag of gold out of his pocket placed it on the table before him.

Scroggie was sitting in an attentive attitude, but his eyes were never raised from the fire, and a worn look, which I had not observed at first, had settled upon his face. Bowser moved nearer toward us, coming within the circle of light under the lamp; and, emptying out of his bag a quantity of bright sovereigns, he continued in an impressive voice:

"One night," he told us—"one night, between 11 and 12 o'clock, the cashier is seated in the iron room under a shaded lamp—as I am seated now—weighing the gold as usual, and filling the bags, one after another, entering them in the bullion book, tying them up and casting them aside. He is deeply engrossed in his occupation. Is he thinking—this honest, industrious cashier—is he thinking, as he looks upon this glitter and listens to the clinking and ringing of this gold, what a hateful thing money is? Or—who shall say?—who shall say but what—with a desire for his daughter's happiness passing through his mind—who shall say but what, for her sake, he is wishing that the sovereigns were his own? He is working, working now, solely for her, and if he is dreaming of riches, what more natural on earth? But, whatever his thoughts may be, he is so absorbed that he hears no cat-like footsteps moving stealthily toward the spot where he weighs the gold—clink, clink, clink—he sees no shadow cross the light in the outer room, within a short distance of where he stands; he hears nothing, observes nothing, until the arm is uplifted swiftly behind him, and a stifled cry escapes him—no time for more. He falls, beaten and crushed by a heavy blow. What's happened? A murder committed in the dead of night."

When Bowser had uttered these words there was a silence between us for some minutes. Scroggie was the first even to move in his chair. I had refilled his glass during the last pause in the narrative; and he now stretched out his hand hastily and lifted the tumbler to his lips, and drank it off as if it were water. His hand shook violently as he placed the empty glass on the mantleshelf. I had often seen his hand tremble—indeed, it was seldom quite steady—but he had never exhibited such excessive nervousness before.

"Well," said he, without looking round.

"There is not much more to tell," said Bowser. "It was evidently a collusion between the bank porter and a sailor—or at least a man who looked very like one—seen loitering about in the neighborhood of a public house on the night previous to the one on which this tragedy occurred. The porter was arrested, tried, and sentenced to penal servitude for life."

"And the sailor," said Scroggie.

"Escaped. He made off with bags containing a large sum of gold, and he has never been heard of since."

With these words Bowser rose from his seat, and began to pace up and down the room, playing with his bag of gold in an excited manner.

"Yes," said he, presently, "the murderer escaped. But I have sworn to solve this mystery as to who is the murderer of her father before I marry Alice Darell. That is the clause in our engagement. If the villain is alive I will ferret him out, hunt him down and bring him to justice. For I love Alice Darell more than my life, and for her I would run any risk. Mr. Darell was my friend. I honored him as much as if he had been my own father."

He stopped, glanced round the room with a savage energy expressed in his face; and then, flinging up the bag of sovereigns defiantly, he cried:

"But the clink of gold will some day awaken the evil conscience! The man who has committed this crime will betray himself at last. His guilt will be branded on his face like an ugly scar, when he hears the sound—clink, clink, clink! There is no escape. The conscience is stronger than the man."

Again Bowser tossed up the bag of gold, and paced the room more excited than ever.

"My dear Bowser," I exclaimed, "for heaven's sake be rational! To visit, as you do, the lowest haunts in London, to mix among savages—for some of these men in the East End are nothing better—is to expose yourself to real dangers. These sailors know the sound of gold only too well. Some night you will, I again warn you, be robbed and murdered. And that," I added, "that will scarcely be agreeable news for me to carry to Alice Darell. Once more, let me seriously advise you to abandon this scheme. And Scroggie," I added—"Scroggie will, I know, support me in my appeal."

"Abandon it," said Bowser, as he walked toward the door. "Why, I've already taken two or three sharp detectives into my confidence. Good night! I'm going to meet one now."

II.

No sooner had Frank Bowser gone than Scroggie's whole manner changed. His face grew cheerful, and his voice again sounded natural and pleasing.

"I suppose," said he, turning over the leaves of a volume—"I suppose you haven't dined. Have you?"

So well did I know Scroggie's character that I was at once convinced by the manner in which he put this question, that he had not dined. When, or where, in fact, he ate anything was another problem, as deep as the one as to when or where he slept. I had often thought—when trying to puzzle out the life, since our school days, of this strange individual—that he never slept anywhere or ate anything except within my chambers. He was always supernaturally hungry—though, to do him justice, he adopted all the gentlemanly devices which he could invent in order to conceal his voracity.

Of course, I declared that I had had nothing to eat worth mentioning since the morning, though in truth I had dined sumptuously at the Old Clock tavern with Frank Bowser at 5 o'clock. But it was now nearly 11, and I did not doubt that I should be able to do justice to the savory pie and the pickles and other luxuries placed by Mrs. Billings, my laundress, that afternoon in my cupboard.

The gusto with which Scroggie spread the cloth and arranged the table, while I went on a foraging expedition, into gloomy recesses, in search of provisions, would have given an edge to any man's appetite. We had forgotten in five minutes all about Frank Bowser and the sound of gold.

"I can't help thinking, Field," said he, when he had partially appeased a very keen appetite—"I can't help thinking that you are an uncommonly lucky fellow."

"Possibly," said I. "But few men, you know, consider themselves lucky."

Scroggie glanced round the room; and I could see by the nervous manner in which he was rolling a fresh cigarette that he had something on his mine which he wished to communicate. "Uncommonly lucky," he went on thoughtfully; a cosy set of chambers, a warm fire, an easy chair, a reference library—all complete! Not much inducement, under the circumstances, to leave England. Now, have you?"

I had returned to my arm-chair, and had lit my pipe. I answered, with my eyes on the fire, where pictures rose up among the red and rugged coals:

"A tour through France, Switzerland and Italy is a pleasure which I'm looking forward to. At present I can't afford it."

"No!" said Scroggie, quickly, and in a tone of concern; though whether for me or for himself, I could not decide.

Scroggie looked still thoughtful. Presently he said:

"Field, old fellow, for more than two years now I have been living in London; and almost on my arrival I began to receive hospitality from you. You gave me a hearty welcome when we met; and ever since I have been 'dropping' in here, and, I am afraid, wasting valuable time."

I assured him—how could I do otherwise?—that he had never wasted an hour.

"Well," he said, doubtfully, "I hope not. However, it will end to-night. I'm going to travel."

I expressed astonishment, though nothing could have surprised me less.

"Yes; I'm going to travel," he repeated; "and although it was my intention to have started without mentioning the matter even to you, somehow, after all your kindness, I thought perhaps if I did it might have created a wrong impression. I wished to think—I wished to—to—. Yes. I'm going to travel."

"America?" I suggested.

"That depends," he replied quickly—"that depends on circumstances. I'm waiting for a—for instructions. Anyhow," he added, "I'm going to travel."

Now that he had relieved his mind of the confession, he began to grow drowsy, and frequently nodded at the fire, as though we were bidding it adieu.

"You're tired," said I, at a moment when I thought he appeared to be looking in my direction.

"I'm going," was his reply, shutting his eyes and again nodding at the fire, "to travel."

"Not to-night!"

He started up suddenly, with a cry upon his lips.

"What?"

"I asked you if you were tired," said I.

"Tired? No. Was I dreaming?"

"Yes," said I. "Won't you lie down?"

"Well," he answered, looking toward the sofa sleepily, "if you've no objection. Yes, I think I will for five minutes. I shall be all right in five minutes, eh?"

He always said "five minutes," but his sleep usually lasted over the night, and often far into the day that followed. He pulled off his coat, threw my rug over his shoulders and lay down.

"I say, Field, old fellow," said he, in a scarcely audible tone, as he turned his weary face to the wall, "what a hospitable—old chap—you are. I say—dear boy—I'm—going—to—trav—"

Then I heard his heavy breathing, and knew that he was fast asleep.

How long I sat in my arm-chair before the fire after Scroggie had fallen asleep I do not know; but hours must have passed before the incident occurred which I am now about to relate. I felt no inclination to retire to bed; and in this wakeful mood many strange fancies took possession of me; and the most strange of them all was that a sound like the clink of gold was ringing in my brain. I became troubled with a presentment that some harm had befallen my friend Bowser. In this nervous, dreamy condition my thoughts became so completely separated from my immediate surroundings that when, with a suddenness that appalled me, the dead silence of the night was disturbed by a prolonged and dreadful shout, my heart seemed to have ceased to beat, and my limbs to be paralyzed with terror. The impulse was strong within me to spring to my feet. But although my brain was remarkably active, strange to say, my body was dead to all sense of volition. Yet, although I could not move my head, objects which passed within the limits of my vision were not even clouded, but distinctly defined; and there I saw, with the pale and haggard face of one who is haunted, my old school-fellow, Scroggie. His eyes were wide open, and seemed to express an irresistible fascination for some beckoning spirit. Presently he spoke in whispers, as though addressing this phantom of his brain, but in a voice so low that not a word reached my ear. At last he looked about as though the shadow had vanished; though his breath fell more quickly from his lips, and his right arm now stiffened from the shoulder, and he grasped, in fancy, some heavy weapon which he was handling with a look of dogged energy and resolution; his face had changed into the expression of a demon, dark as night, and he seemed to be groping his way, as if blind, and stopping in a listening attitude, and then groping on again, but with one overmastering purpose.

Suddenly he raised his arm; and with this imaginary weapon, aimed at the air a blow so full of concentrated force that he staggered under it, uttered a low cry, and fell heavily to the ground.

Then, and only then, the power to move came back to me; and I sprang to his assistance. He was lying on his back, gasping; he had become as black in the face as if he had been transformed into a veritable demon. With great difficulty I succeeded in loosening his collar; each moment, it seemed to me, must be his last.

I raised him from the floor and placed him on the sofa: and slowly signs of consciousness returned. After staring around the room in a strange, bewildered fashion, his eyes settled upon my face.

"Are you all right now?"

He put his hand to his forehead, and a look of pain passed over his face such as I shall never forget.

"All right," said he; "all right. It was only a dream."

Then he again turned his face toward the wall, muttering, "Only a dream," and then he again fell asleep.

My pulse, beating loudly, sounded in my ear like ghostly whisperings that seemed to warn me that I was alone in my chambers with the man who had murdered the father of Alice Darell.

When I had found my way into the bedroom, and struck a light, I formed a resolution to act promptly as soon as morning dawned. I fell into a sleep, against which I had struggled successfully for hours. I soon began to dream that some one was knocking at the door—a knocking which seemed to continue for hours; when suddenly I opened my eyes and found myself in broad daylight.

As the knocking still went on I sprang up and exclaimed: "Who's there?"

"Only me, sir."

It was the voice of my laundress, Mrs. Billings.

"Why, what's the time?"

"Struck 3, sir, if you'll believe me."

I opened the door and glanced quickly toward the sofa.

Scroggie had vanished.

"Where is Mr. Scroggie?" said I.

"Gone, sir; hours ago," said Mrs. Billings. "Says he, sir: 'Don't disturb Mr. Field.' Them was his words. Says he, sir: 'Mr. Field ain't well.' And, says he—"

"What time did he go?"

"Mr. Scroggie," said my laundress, meditatively. "When I comes into the room, sir, he jumps up and goes out. If you'll believe me."

"Do you know if Mr. Bowser is in?"

Mrs. Billings gave me a smile through the black patches on her red face and said:

"Lor', sir, Mr. Bowser went out early, too."

"But he may have returned."

"No, sir. He ain't returned," said Mrs. Billings. "I was in his rooms not five minutes ago. If you'll believe me."

I now remembered my engagement to take tea with Miss Pilkington and Alice Darell; and it occurred to me, as not improbable, that Frank Bowser had already gone to Guilford street, where they lived. It was nearly 4 o'clock, so I hastened to make my toilet.

As I drove to Miss Pilkington's, meditating over Bowser's scheme to awaken a guilty conscience with the clink of gold, a thought which had hitherto only taken shadowy form in my mind now took shape. I became convinced that Bowser suspected Scroggie; and Scroggie was the man he was hunting down.

The necessity for seeing Bowser, concerning this strange affair, appeared every moment more urgent. Yet, as the cab drew up at Miss Pilkington's door, I felt unnerved and disinclined to meet him. His conduct required some explanation. He had not, I thought, behaved to me like a friend.

Miss Pilkington's house in Guilford street had an old-fashioned appearance of comfort which was exceedingly inviting. Passing through the snug entrance hall, where a strong inner door seemed to be holding all draughts at defiance, and up a softly-carpeted staircase, I was shown into a room in which the air was as warm and pleasant as a well-ventilated conservatory; and here I found Miss Pilkington, sitting in an arm chair, near the fire, wrapped up as if she were some rare exotic.

Alice Darell came forward to welcome me, in that unaffected manner in which she received all Frank Bowser's visitors.

"And where is Mr. Bowser?" said Miss Pilkington.

Alice seconded the question with her large, dark, inquiring eyes.

I said that I had not seen Frank Bowser since the previous evening, and that I had expected to find him already here.

"He is not ill?" said Alice.

My face must have expressed anxiety, for Alice Darell gave me a quick, searching look which I had difficulty in meeting without betraying my thoughts.

"No," said I. [illegible]

"I do not know; but [illegible]"

"But I'[illegible]"

"Nonsense," said Miss Pilkington, straightening her back; [illegible] tea."

And the [illegible] glanced from Alice to the tea-tray [illegible] her chair. Miss Pilkington prided herself on her punctuality in all her domestic arrangements.

"Won't you wait a little while for Frank?" said Alice.

"Certainly not," said Miss Pilkington, forcing out the words in an exhausted voice.

Alice [illegible] into her eyes.

To [illegible] turbing domestic calm seemed to me a grave necessity. I passed another half-hour in a state of [illegible] subjects with Miss Pilkington over their tea; and [illegible] she said:

"Tell Mr. Bowser, when you see him, that I like punctuality. [illegible] it, in India, all my life."

I [illegible] when I [illegible] voice.

"Stay one moment, please," said Alice, as she descended [illegible] up beseechingly [illegible] the trouble. [illegible] do not conceal it from me."

I no longer doubted [illegible] mad scheme.

"Nothing has happened," said I, "that I know of."

"But you have some reason to be so anxious?"

"Yes," I said. "It's no use trying to keep that from you."

"Where is he to-night?"

"I cannot tell you. I am going to look for him now."

Alice glanced up the stairs and then into my face distractedly.

"I wish I could come, too."

"I took her hand and said:

"Trust me, Alice; I will find him. It is cruel to give you so much anxiety.

As soon as I reached the street I sprang into a cab which was passing and drove back to the Temple. If I had been released from prison I could not have experienced a greater sense of freedom, though the position of affairs appeared no less serious—far from that. But I seemed to have thrown off heavy fetters and to be grappling with the situation now in good earnest.

First I stepped across to Bowser's chambers; but as I ascended the staircase I saw, with a sinking hope, that his outer door was closed, a sure sign that he was not there. Nevertheless I knocked loudly; but I received no answer.

Next I went to my own rooms. I searched in my box for letters. There were several, but not a line from Frank.

I stood for some minutes meditating over what course I should now pursue.

Suddenly I remembered Frank Bowser's words: "I'm hunting about near the docks at Limehouse."

It seemed like a voice; and I was eager to start.

Having put on a thick coat, and selected a heavy walking stick, I hastened out again into the night, and turned my steps toward Limehouse.

When I reached the railway terminus, near Fenchurch street, I was told that a train would start for the docks in a few minutes; and as I hurried up the staircase it came slowly into the station.

A journey across the tops of houses, and through smoke issuing from a forest of chimneys, is not at the best of seasons calculated to awake cheerful thoughts. To me—glancing out of window at this dismal prospect, or what glimpses were visible in the dark night—the effect was so depressing that I again became troubled with melancholy forebodings; and yet, as we tore along toward the docks, these forebodings developed into no distinct fear in my mind; they were shadowy, like the housetops and the smoking forest of chimneys; they conveyed no meaning beyond a general sense of gloom.

Limehouse was reached at last. Turning down the street to the left after leaving the station I walked quickly along in the direction which leads into the Old Ferry Road. I had walked some distance along this dark roadway sometimes gaining a glimpse of the canal or of a wharf as I crossed a bridge, but always coming again into the shadow of these high walls, when suddenly I saw, in this dim light, a solitary figure approaching—a figure with a slouching swing about the shoulders, which made my heart beat quickly. Walking with a hurried step, this figure soon became more distinct; and in another minute I had recognized the face.

But as the figure passed by, I could find no voice. If a sound had escaped my lips it must have been a cry of horror. As I had seen the face of Scroggie on the preceding night, so I had seen it now pale and haggard, with the eyes of a hunted animal, dead beaten, and nearly brought to bay. But there was something more than that; here was an indescribable expression of some fresh crime committed, overshadowing him, and he seemed to be groping his way, like a man who is eager to avert his own destruction.

Voices now reached me, from the direction in which Scroggie had come, and I ran on; for I fancied, I recognized Frank Bowser's voice among them.

As I came in sight of the old Ferry road some one stepped abruptly in my path, and turned the light of a dark lantern full in my face. It was a constable, who eyed me with evident suspicion.

When I mentioned Bowser's name and told him who I was the man appeared satisfied, for he said: "Come this way," and making a beckoning motion with his lantern, walked down the road. Something in his manner suggested a dreadful thought; a question was on my lips, but I feared to ask it, and followed him in silence.

At a corner of the road we found another constable. He came forward as we approched, and turned his lantern upon me as the other had done.

"Friend of his," said my conductor, introducing me; "friend from the temple."

"Right," said the other, in a snapping manner.

I now observed a third lantern flashing about down a dark turning. At the further end three men were bending down, and one of them, apparently a surgeon, was bandaging the head of a person who was being supported by the others.

A cry escaped me; it was Frank Bowser. He uttered my name in a faint voice when I leaned over him.

"Tell her," said he, speaking so low that I could scarcely hear the words, "tell her that my scheme succeeded. What I said I would do, tell her, I have now done. I have found the man. I have hunted him down. Tell her——"

No further words reached my ear; his lips still moved, but unconsciousness quickly followed.

Many days passed before he spoke again. He then told me—as he lay upon the sofa in my chambers, with Alice Darell seated beside him and Miss Pilkington near the fire, in an arm chair, looking very stern, he then told me how he happened accidentally, one day, to be clinking some gold in his pocket, in Scroggie's presence, when he noticed that a strange look came over his face which roused his suspicions; and he then and there determined to adopt this plan, and thoroughly satisfy himself before giving the affair more serious thought. He acknowledged his fault in omitting to take me into his confidence; but he did not wish to destroy my belief in Scroggie without a stronger proof. Upon the eventful night in which he related the details connected with the bank tragedy, his suspicions had been confirmed. He had gone to Limehouse, where Scroggie was known to the police, and where, it was supposed, he lived, and a warrant had actually been granted for his arrest. That evening, as Bowser supposed, Scroggie must have followed him, and there, near the gateway, had nearly succeeded in his evident design to take his life.

Scroggie was found drowned in one of the dock basins at Limehouse upon the day following his attempt upon the life of Frank Bowser. Frank has been married for years to Alice Darell, but every detail must remain fresh in my memory as long as I live.

IN A LIBRARY.

Lend you a book? Why, certainly!
What will you have? Here is a sweet,
Strong tale of love. It brought to me
Knowledge of what great love might be,
How fast a heart might learn to beat.
[illegible] 'Twill repay
[illegible]; or this worn
[illegible] that gray
[illegible] out this gay
[illegible] holdes a thorn.

That? No, I cannot—pardon me,
[illegible] it was here.
[illegible] loved, you see;
[illegible] ers me,
[illegible] uncouth tear.

[illegible] f. My name
[illegible] page within.
[illegible] ught him no fame,
[illegible] 'Twas all the same
[illegible] void of sin.

[illegible] n I have known
[illegible] saint as he!
[illegible] ould have straightway flown
[illegible] orld, like rose leaves blown,
[illegible] dear self to me.

[illegible] re; as white
[illegible] nfant calm,
[illegible] This? Ah, a high
[illegible] Yes, 'tis quite [illegible] lady's palm.

[illegible] r well! Good-by.
[illegible] rent hands, I'll take [illegible] as sometimes I

[illegible] a dead saint's sake.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW

Tapestries.

Beautiful things are made out of leather. Painted panels of life-size figures are set in plush or velvet for portieres at the cost of $150 each. Figures are also painted on plush, the face and hands being made of inserted [illegible] in the same way for the same purpose. But hand-made tapestries are, of course, the handsomest and most expensive portieres one can find, but they are extremely rare. Next to these come silk velvets, brilliant flowers on pale grounds, at the cost of from $35 to $50 a yard. Some pink and [illegible] design in cream and [illegible] in relief, was used for the walls. Some of the hangings have broad embroidered stripes going across them at about the height of a high dado. Other rooms are hung with satin, checked off in diamond patterns by worked ivory. Others have a light Japanese wood carving almost like lace for the frieze. This wood work is also used in cabinets and bookcases over silk curtains. One of the handsomest bookcases has three compartments, the center one being shut in with a door of open-work brass, behind which one can put magazines and so forth. For upholstery loom-woven tapestries are largely used in libraries, sitting-rooms and everywhere but the drawing-room. They come in an immense variety and an equal range in cost, and are very rich in coloring and texture. The best thing for parlors, however, both in wear and appearance, is the old-satin damask, which is brought out in all the new shades and beauties. Some of it is plain stuff richly embroidered and very expensive, but for $14 a yard one can get a very handsome parlor covering. To go with it is plush for the window curtains, either plainly lined or embroidered with a spray running the whole length, or with an embroidered strip about half way up, or trimmed with a fringe a foot or eighteen inches wide, turned over at the top and a narrow gimp all around. This is the way they recommend one to do at Lewis Tiffany's rooms, but the materials they have there, although costly, are not nearly so handsome, we thought, in spite of patriotism, as the exquisite French fabrics.

Rugs.

New York Letter: Next in order came rugs. Of course, floors are either made entirely or bordered with hard woods, and the rugs are arranged with sockets and pins to keep them firmly in place. We had by good fortune heard of an East India company as having a large variety of real Oriental goods, and we went at once there. It is way down town, and the oddest of places. I felt as if I was an embalmed mummy after sitting there awhile, so numerous are the spices and gums and odors of indescribable Eastern things which abound. But the rugs are well worth seeing. There were beautiful ageas three-fourths of an inch thick, every thread made by hand, most of them, unfortunately, by the prisoners in India. Others, called nomads, are woven in the tents by different hands, and with only a general idea kept in the design; no two points of a diamond, for instance, being opposite one another, nor one end of the rug being like the other. Sometimes they take a year to make one of them; sometimes ten years. It is like a lady's fancy work. All the colors are indescribably rich and soft, but the antiques are the most beautiful. As they are rolled out clouds of dust arise, and the worn spots which are proudly pointed out as adding each $50 to the worth of the rug, make one think of the many knees that have pressed them, for these antiques nearly all come from mosques, where they have lain no one knows how long. They are made of camel's hair and have an exquisite gloss and sheen from time, and the colors fade away into one another until, as one of our party said, "They are lovely enough to make one cry." The prices range all the way from $10 to $2,000. An extravagant cost, but any Oriental rug will wear out two generations, unless one gets a Murzapoor, which is a frail though very pretty carpet.

A Race Course Toilet.

A costume admired on a Parisian race course is of honeysuckle-colored surah and brown velvet. The round skirt is bordered with two narrow plaited ruffles, surmounted by a deep band of velvet. This same trimming is repeated twice above on the skirt. In front is a long surah apron in two pieces, which are joined in the center under a rather broad band of velvet terminating in a long loop and end. The right side is slightly draped, and the left side is very full and trimmed with three bands of velvet taken diagonally across. It is draped high over the hip. In the back is a breadth o surah, mounted on large round plaits, and fastened below near the border of the skirt. Down the sides of the skirt are bands of velvet, and the one on the left side forms a long loop and end. The waist opens down the front to show a plastron of "mousseline de soie." On either side of the plastron are brown velvet revers. The front and small side pieces of the basque are cut up, and have a narrow band of goods placed in the cut up part, and trimmed with two narrow plaited ruffles. The back, with its small side pieces, forms three fluted plaits. The small straight collar is of velvet. The tight-fitting sleeve has a surrah plaiting, surrounded by a velvet band. The hat matching this suit has a broad brim and a high crown. The brim is lined with brown velvet. Around the crown are ribbon loops and ostrich tips. Another dress is of white "crepon" and lace. The false skirt has one or more lace flounces. Over this skirt are silk quille trimmings, covered with artificial flowers. The latter may be replaced by silk or beaded embroidery. The tunique polonaise buttons down the front to the waist. It opens over the breast and closes in the neck. A small white crape drapery starts from the seams over the shoulders, is taken down either side of the open part, and is then joined below against the middle of the waist. It is next twisted and taken to the left hip, where it is fastened under flowers. These flowers extend all the way down the side of the skirt. The princess back forms a full puffing. The sleeves are of lace and terminate at the elbow. They are finished with a narrow ruffle.

Parlors and Reception Rooms.

Parlor or reception-room suits are often made up of several pieces, each differing from the other in design, wood and covering. As a rule, in fine furniture, straight lines and plain effects, rather than the Eastlake models prevail, with surface carving. Old English styles furnish models for much of the modern furniture, in which appears the swell front, brass mouldings, elaborate carving and claw-feet. Hall furniture consists of chairs with antique framework and a mirror and hat-rack combined, under which is placed a heavy wood settee, remarkable for its elaborate carving. Novelties in hat-racks are Japanese fans bristling with brass pins, and designed to hang on the wall. Handsome hall chairs are those with oak framework, studded with brass ornaments, and having a seat and back of alligator skin or embossed leather. There are also hall chairs with rosewood frames inlaid with brass and covered with morocco. For bedrooms, fashionable suits are of mahogany, finished either with brass trimmings or surface carvings. Attractive suits are also made of cherry with mahogany finish. Canopied beds have almost entirely given place to the low open ones introduced by the French. The landscape style of mirror is the one now employed for bureaus. A favorite style of bureau is made after the fashion of a dressing-table, with wide, low top, swinging glass and brass sconces on either side. The washstand to the modern bedroom suit is also now in construction, and includes a commode in addition to the usual drawers. Cabinets are exceedingly popular and a house is no longer considered complete without one or more of this grade of furniture. The fact that a cabinet is a convenient receptacle and capable of any amount of ornamentation guarantees its continued popularity. Cabinets are manufactured in a great variety of style, both as regards material and design. Cocobola is a fashionable wood for cabinets; so are amaranth, mahogany and rosewood. A novelty in hanging cabinets is plush-covered and consists of irregularly disposed shelves. The houses into which the furniture described goes, as a rule, are finished in hard wood. Mahogany, oak and cherry are favorite woods for interior work.

Glass and China.

Glass and china, says a New York letter, come out in constantly new designs. The most beautiful of the former is the English glass in opaline shades, with bunches of berries, or a bunch of plums, or dwarf pears, in their natural colors and size, leaves and all, drooping over the edge. Cut glass, of course, never loses its superiority, and is brought to great perfection by both English and American manufacturers. French china comes in square shapes for all the vegetable dishes, tureens, etc., and is called Psyche, from the butterflies which form the handles. Sevres shapes in cups and saucers come in purchasable material, and are of course very pretty. Plaques still abound, and some of the large ones with original paintings upon them are well worthy a place in an art gallery. The most exquisite thing of this kind, however, is the pate-sur-pate, which for those who are as ignorant as we were, must be explained. They are smooth glazed surfaces in some dark color with a design raised upon it like a fine cameo, each layer being burned separately. The great difficulty is not to have the edges of the figures lose their fine incisiveness, and when one succeeds it brings a high price. Tiffany, for one 6x18 inches, charged $500, but we saw others elsewhere even more beautiful in design and more difficult of execution, of the same size and at only $90. These are real Solons, who never send out anything which is not perfect; inferior ones cost much less.

Velvets.

Plain velvet will be largely employed, not only for dress skirts and entire costumes, but for cloaks. It will also be much used for trimmings and in association with woolen stuffs. With the rage for velvets will reappear the velvet basque, to wear with skirts of other fabrics. Figured velvets will appear in a great variety of designs. Some specimens seen exhibited set figures of large dimensions, which, it must be said, are more striking than beautiful. Many ladies will hesitate to wear a dress, however elegant as regards quality, that is covered with begonia leaves or devil-fish, and yet these and other equally absurd subjects contribute designs on some of the new figured velvets. There never has been a velvet season without silken fabrics of great richness of color and effect. Velvet calls for an association of elegant materials. Velvet will lead during the fall and winter in fabrics, and consequently dress goods will be correspondingly elegant in effect. Among handsome dress goods already opened are several new styles of brocades. In one of these gold and silver thread are interwoven through figures on satin ground. In another are reproduced quaint figures from silks 200 years old. The Ottoman brocades are quite new, and will attract much attention, and probably a large share of patronage. Ottoman silks in black and new colors are largely imported; so are the rhadzimes silks. Then there are now Pekin silks with stripes; and the Pekin velours with a ground of satin merveilleux, overlaid with stripes, through which occur velvet figures.

The Matinee.

Embroidered silk gauze was formerly in request for evening toilets only, but now it also serves for in-door dresses. There is a great difference between the matinee as now worn and the same garment as it was first brought out. There is now no material too rich for this use, and few dressy matinees are without puffings, paniers, or draperies of embroidered gaze de soie. A matinee of this kind is made of crushed strawberry surah. The elbow sleeves are trimmed with a deep piece of cream-colored Spanish blonde. The collarette has the same trimming. The front opens from the neck down, like a fichu. Inside of the opening is a Fedora gauze puffing of cream-colored brocaded silk with small floral designs. This puffing is taken from the lower part of the waist to the side, where it is raised, and then forms the back puffing. On the left shoulder is a crushed strawberry rosette. Another rosette is among the gauze puffings. A very new style of wrapper is of cherry foulard. The back is princess shape, and a single button closes the front. It opens over the usual "Fedora" piece, of surah, with broad cherry and straw-colored stripes. The plaited skirt is of the same striped goods. The belt around the waist has a buckle to close it in front and is taken under the "Fedora" puffing. Over the belt, on either side of the buckle, are two false pockets of cherry velvet which have the appearance of two small basque pieces. In the neck is a small cherry officer's collar. The sleeves open to the elbow and are trimmed with striped surah.

Lamps.

Seventeen houses out of twenty are furnished with chandeliers, the other three using side brackets. Either way, one can have beautiful articles in oxidized silver and old-gold Persian devices worked to the last extremity of fineness. Enamel is also used with exceeding taste. The hammered metals are in every shape, but are more common. The burners generally simulate candles in the drawing-room, and can be made to give light equal to other burners. Shades are of cut glass, producing a delightful sparkle for a parlor, or for a library of soft pink or green glass blown in waves of increasing and diminishing color. Of these last there was only one—a sample—as yet in America. For balls beautiful lamps are made. A large one had four of the glass tiles set in broken brick, and when lighted within produced a soft richness quite indescribable. Another had a new moon, with the points meeting, made of jeweled glass, inclosing a sheet of plain glass with a large enameled spider and his web in the middle. Since a good house wife would not allow a real spider, why should she an artificial one? Brass and silver lamps are much used in libraries and sitting rooms, and are made very handsome and in very graceful shapes, at from $25 to $100. The Pompeian shape is going out, and reservoir lamps take their place. These can have wicks inserted which last a lifetime, and give twice the light of an Argand burner.

New India Goods.

Among the new goods is a soft India cashmere, almost equal to the Jersey cloth in elasticity, that even an indifferent dressmaker should be able to manipulate. At a store where they make India goods a specialty is shown a soft real India silk, light and durable as calico—in the same soft, light fabrics that our grandmothers delighted in. It will not wrinkle or crease, and the ecru-colored ground is spun from the raw silk, and has the light, brilliant lustre of undyed material. It comes, however, in colors, and the figures are old and quaint, although so small that only a careful inspection discovers the Oriental origin. There has been no greater educator of color and harmony of design than the camel's hair shawl. New York women, who as a general thing are very conservative and dress very much alike, insist upon the center of a shawl being black or red. But in Philadelphia, which was once such a port for Eastern trade, one will see on the streets odd and beautiful shawls, with all manner of quaint centers. Dull, faded greens and soft, crushed strawberry (doubtless this color was adopted from an ancient stuff), and occasionally a rare old yellow shawl that could not now be purchased for love or money. Decca shawls are very much in vogue now for dolmans, and a shawl that was originally worth $50 can now be purchased for half that price. The Decca work is a much longer stitch than the valley cashmere. It has the appearance of fine, close embroidery, while the valley cashmere looks like tapestry.

An Actress' Jewels.

The last jewel Miss Coghlan has received comes from one of her girl admirers, and consists of a cable band bracelet that closes with a pair of shamrocks, marked respectively "R. C." Another bracelet, made of rectangles of gold articulating, is set with a crest of diamonds, opals, turquoises and a pair of solitaires, and was a gift from Miss Emie Germon, who, while playing Naomi Tighe in School, got very sick and was obliged to lose her place in the company but for the unselfishness of Miss Coghlan, then leading lady, who cut her vacation short, learned the part and finished the business as a substitute. "Here's the ring Mr. Wallack gave me for helping him out of the fix." It is set with diamonds and turquoises alternating in an endless loop. Rose, however, did not like to have so many precious stones hidden in the palm of her hand, so she had the ring cut, putting the two semi-circles on the back and a plain wire the rest of the way. When Wallack asked where his regard was now, she pertly answered, "I cut it." A ring from poor Agnes Elliott, who was the original Olive in Silver King, has the setting made of three semi-circles of pearls, one white, one black, and a third pink. "But I must show you a photograph of my Skye terrier. I saw it in Tiffany's and bought it. Look!" and she showed a scarf pin the size of a silver quarter, representing the head of a dog. The face protruded, and was made of carved ridges set with small diamonds, with moonstones for the eyes, a black pearl for the nose, coral lips, and a small dog collar set with rubies.

Benares and Persian Wares.

The crowning delight in bric-a-brac nowadays is Benares and Persian wares. The Benares looks like pure gold, which does not dull with time, chased in queer designs and formed into jardinieres, pitchers, cups, bells, etc. It also is made into gourd-shaped lamps, which are used by the muezzin in calling the people to prayer at night from the top of a minaret. The Persian ware is like enameled silver and gold, and comes in a large variety of articles, all beautiful and remarkably cheap. Then there are sets of sword, shield and helmet, such as Lohengrin appears in, all wrought in this same stuff, and with as many figures as had Achilles' shield. A number of pieces of cloisonne present a neat appearance with their sky-blue inlaid with brass and enamel. Then there are sandal wood boxes carved intricately in relief, and miniature paintings done so finely that through a magnifying glass one can not detect the stroke of the brush, and can see each undivided hair in the smooth tresses of sultana. As we were leaving, after hours spent in pleasurable wanderings to and fro, the owner as a last inducement said: "And don't you want a peacock, or duck, or rooster?" for these animals, and camels besides, come in the fretted Benares wares, almost as large as life, and much prettier.

Plumage.

The cream spotted muslins, printed with sprays of scarlet or pink geranium blossoms or bunches of small china asters, are much worn, and are usually cut a la Watteau. They are both quaint and pretty looking, and, if properly made, look as if they had just been taken out from between the lavender and pot-pourri of your grandmother's chest.

Dark red waistcoats and revers, closely covered with gold braid, are considered very stylish. A silver gray dress embroidered in silver, with white watered silk vest, likewise embroidered, is a unique and delicate looking dress for special occasions, but one that soon bears its date.

Worth is making up brocaded plushes for the next season in pale nun's gray and dark laurel green, in combination with heavy ottoman silk of the latter shade, and also in sapphire blue and dark amber plush combined with dark blue ottoman, etc.

All sorts of materials are used for afternoon tea-aprons; embroidered muslin, bandana handkerchiefs, plush, moire and lace are all in favor for these fanciful additions to the dressy house toilet.

Puffed bindings of velvet or satin upon the edges of Langtry turbans and the brims of bonnets and large round hats will be in great use this autumn.

The newest tennis hats are made of gray satin open work straw, faced with cardinal, and trimmed with peacock-feather ends and sea gull's wing.

London girls of the highest social position are making it fashionable to take lessons in dressmaking. This is a move in the right direction.

Pretty tea-aprons are made of Oriental net, with ruffles of oriental lace over strawberry surah, and also of ficelle lace over pale blue satin.

High sleeves and high collars, the long-pointed basque, and the robe cut away from the hips, remain the features in summer styles.

Gloves are still worn very long, and the new English styles are gathered at intervals around the wrist and arm, forming puffs.

Seaside suits of flannel serge will be worn in all colors, but bright tints and white will be preferred by young ladies and misses.

Linen band collars have two buttonholes near the upper edge, through which narrow ribbon is run and tied in a long-looped bow.

Biscuit-colored tweed, with collars, cuffs and accessories of peacock-blue velvet, plush or velveteen, make stylish walking suits.

The old-fashioned Garibaldi waist is being revived.

For the Teeth.

The ideal and almost unattainable ice-cream is made by following this receipt: Two quarts of cream (not milk), one pound of pulverized sugar, two eggs. Beat the eggs; then beat the sugar with them; then the cream. Let this just come to a boil; then remove from the fire, flavor with vanilla, strain it through a very fine sieve, or, if you have none, a clean, new piece of cheese-cloth will answer in place of one. When cool, put it in the freezer and freeze, stirring until it is too hard to turn any longer.

Almond cakes baked in small square tins are nice to put with other cakes in a basket. To nine ounces of flour allow six ounces of sugar, nearly half a pound of butter, four eggs, two teaspoonfuls of baking-powder; beat the butter and sugar together, then add the eggs, beating them with the butter and sugar, and not separate; mix the baking-powder with the flour; if the dough seems too stiff a little sweet milk may be added. Blanch some almonds, slice them, and with powdered sugar cover the tops of the cakes with the slices.

A nourishing drink for an invalid is made by toasting slices of bread which is made of rye flour and Indian meal: the slices should be cut thin, and should be thoroughly dried in the toasting process; put them in a pitcher, or in a bright tin pail; pour boiling water over them, and let this stand for half an hour. This may be iced, or may be drunk while warm, and it will satisfy thirst and give nourishment at the same time.

A baked omelet is quickly made, and is certain to be light. Heat one pint of sweet milk, and put a dessertspoonful of butter in it while hot; wet a heaping tablespoonful of flour in a little cold milk; when smooth beat four eggs very light with it and stir into the hot milk; add almost a teaspoonful of salt. Bake in a pudding dish in a hot oven. This may also be served with sauce as pudding.

A delicate and inexpensive dish for dessert is made by boiling some rice until it is perfectly tender; cook some tart apples at the same time; when they are soft, beat them with a spoon until they are light; season with sugar and a little cinnamon, and put a layer of rice in a pudding dish; then a layer of the apple sauce, until the dish is full, having the apple on the top. Serve warm or cold, with cream.

Tart apples make a delicate entree cooked thus: Cut them in slices away across the apple, remove the core and seeds, dip in butter, and fry until brown in hot lard. This should be served with pork chops or with roast pork.

If a little salad oil is mixed with mustard for the table, it is greatly improved.

AT LAKE MINNETONKA.

Close of the Season for Good and All—A Retrospect of Doings During the Season, Including the Amusements.

The past week at Minnetonka has been a very dull one; in fact, the season, which practically closed two weeks ago, closed definitely on Thursday. There is no particular reason why the month of September should not be one of the gayest months of the season at this place. The weather is delightful, the fishing the finest that can be had in the Northwest, and the mosquitoes, which have been an annoyance nearly all summer, have fled. So have the hotel managers and all the guests, the only persons remaining being the cottagers, who are determined to stay until the last gun is fired and skates are needed to cross the lake. The Hotel St. Louis closed its doors Monday, the Lake Park followed suit on Wednesday, and on Thursday the Lafayette gave up what all summer must have been a losing enterprise, and shut its doors for the season. The large steamers laid up for the season last Sunday night, and the smaller ones have quietly dropped off until there are but three which make any pretensions to running, and two of these are known as Sunday boats.

RETROSPECTIVE

The past season at Lake Minnetonka has been decidedly slow. And yet it has not been so much of a failure as one might think from a hasty consideration. So far as the larger hotels are concerned, it has not been profitable. But more people have been at Minnetonka this season than ever before. If the contrary would seem to be true it is because the accommodations are greater this year than last. The capacity of the Lafayette has been doubled. The number of boarding houses has been considerably increased. A large number of cottages have been built, so that many of the citizens of St. Paul and Minneapolis, who formerly went to the hotels, now occupy cottages. It has been a good season for the boarding houses. They have been well patronized for the past two months. Excelsior has had many more people as guests this year than during any preceding year. But what has taken the most patronage from the hotels is the increased tendency to occupy cottages. Thus it will be seen that while the hotels have not made much, in other respects the season has not been so much of a failure after all. And one exception must be noted among the hotels. By reason of its situation and class of patronage the Hotel St. Louis has had a full house of regular boarders ever since its opening at the beginning of July.

AMUSEMENTS

In the way of public amusement not much of general interest has taken place. The hops given at the hotels have been more select than in previous years, but they have failed to awaken the enthusiasm that might have been expected. The children's parties at Hotel Lafayette, however, were a weekly delight to the little ones. Successful and elegant germans were danced at the Hotel St. Louis, Lafayette and the Lake Park. While several private musicales have been given, no great musical event has drawn public interest to the lake. A number of sporting events have awakened more or less interest during the summer. The Minnetonka Yacht club's regattas were highly enjoyed by those who participated and those who witnessed. It seems that if some more convenient place than Orono Point were selected for the starting the regattas would awaken more enthusiasm for this graceful and invigorating sport. The Hanlan regatta must be regarded the chief sporting event of the season. It was owing to an ignorant and bungling management, and the fact of an evident crookedness somewhere, that it was no more of a success. The American Association of Civil Engineers, the State Medical association, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Conductors and Engineers of Minnesota, the millers of Minneapolis, and several distinguished railroad parties, not to speak of the Villard party of notables, have honored the lake with their presence during the summer. There have been Sunday school excursions innumerable, and a large number of private picnic parties. All this with boating, fishing and nightly dancing has served to pass the time away pleasantly, although quietly. The building of the Lake Park amusement hall furnishes increased means for enjoyment at that hotel. Though the building was only open about three weeks, it soon became popular. The roller skating rink was a favorite resort for the young people of Minneapolis. When the building is finished it will be an attractive place.

STEAM YACHTS.

The summer has been marked by the advent of quite a number of steam yachts. This seems to be a swift and sure though certainly not the most pleasant means of getting about on the lake. The number of sailing yachts has multiplied considerably. If all were to turn out at the regattas the fleet would number about forty. Forty or fifty yachts, with their white sails distended, would make a beautiful and imposing spectacle at the regattas. The temperance question has been considerably agitated at the lake this summer. Several arrests have been made and some fines paid. The people of Excelsior seem determined that liquor shall not be sold publicly at the lake, or at least on any portion of it coming within the township of Excelsior. The campaign against the business was only commenced this summer. Next season it will be prosecuted with vigor, so say the managers.

MINNETONKA WAVELETS.

Next summer Col. McCrory, of the motor line will have a new steamer, to be run in connection with his road. Plans of the boat, which will carry 150 persons, are now being made by Albertson Bros., Philadelphia.

The Manitoba road now runs only four trains a day to and from the lake. The late trains on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday have also been discontinued.

The cottages at Spring Park, Fairview, Highlands, Breezy and Huntington Points and Maplewood are still enjoying the lake air.

To-day the steamers Hattie May, Lotus, Minneapolis and Why Not will sail the lake and carry those who will visit the big water.

The boat houses at Lake Park, Excelsior and Wayzata have put up half of their row and sail boats for the season.

The occupants of the cottages on Gideon's bay, both in Excelsior and Lake Park will remain at the lake two weeks more.

The motor line will run its summer time-table through September, with the the exception of the owl train.

The ferry between Lake Park and Excelsior, across Gideon's bay, has discontinued its trips.

The fishing was never better. Pickerel and bass being the principal catches.

The Excelsior house and White house are still open for guests at Excelsior.

Steward Young of the Lake Park has returned to Chicago.

THE ONE WHO STAYS.

The one who goes dreams evermore
Of glorious kingdoms to discover;
Sweet visions lure him on and on,
Hope's guardian angels around him hover.
The one who stays sits all alone,
While wearily the days of sorrow
Drag by unchanged by loving tone,
Waiting the still receding morrow.

The one who goes finds manly fame,
A newer love—fond friendship's greeting—
In glory of an honored name,
Forgets his youthful fancy fleeting.
But she who waits through weary years
With patient heart for his returning,
Knows well the thrill of bitter tears,
The torturing pang of hopeless yearning.

And yet there cometh, after all,
A time when wealth, and fame and power
Seem vain and empty, poor and small,
The worthless price of youth's rich dower,
While she who faithful waits afar,
Treading the lowly paths of duty,
Shall see at last truth's guiding star
Flooding the hills and vales with beauty.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

President Norvin Green, of the Western Telegraph company, in his examination before the senate committee at New York, said that experience has shown that it would be a very dangerous experiment in this country to give to any party in power the control of he telegraph as a governmental "institution." In England it is so long since partisan strife has affected the great mass of government employes that the situation is entirely different from that here. Those suggestions are important. Under our present tax system of civil service, the places filled by more than 10,000 operators, to say nothing of clerks and managers, would be thrown into a political field to be fought by political partisans, and, however useful and desirable the postal telegraph may be, the same objections would equally apply.

The eastern papers have had a lack of live topics for some time, owing to dog day lassitude, but now they are all alive to the discussion of a proposition to abolish the ringing of church bells in cities, which is an admitted nuisance to a great many people, especially invalids. The usefulness of the bell among poor and sparse populations who could not afford to own a time-piece and lived so remote from the sanctuary that the noise did not disturb them, made it popular in earlier days, and the custom, now more honored in the breach than the observance, has been handed down to a generation that carries a watch in every pocket and keeps a clock in every house. But the antiquity of the custom is strongly in its favor. A great many good people would almost as soon abolish the church itself as "the church-going bell."

"Thousands of acres of potatoes and corn in New England," says the Boston Traveler, "promising a heavy yield, will hardly pay the expense of digging and harvesting." The drouth of this year is pronounced much more severe and destructive than that of 1882, and serious fear is expressed of the effect on the farming interests throughout the Eastern states. The west, on the other hand, has been signally blessed, notwithstanding the cyclone disasters. The spring opened late, and was cold and unfavorable, but either temperature was even and there was plenty of moisture, and afterwards sufficient heat to ripen almost every product—and frost has held off beyond the usual period, so that anything, not excepting corn, reached maturity.

Villard Excursion on the Rocky Mountains.

Special from Bozeman, (Mon.): Between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of the 7th inst., our train pulled out from Lexington for the first division of the Rocky Mountains. Approaching from the eastern valley, the ascent of the pass is abrupt and short. The summit is the highest point on the line, and is directly over the Bozeman tunnel, on which the work is being pushed rapidly from this point. The scenery is beautiful. Its majesty and grandeur awe even the heavy talkers into silence, broken only by expressions of surprise as some new beauty of landscape or rocky front opened to us through the gorge in front of us. The Gallatin valley, in all its loveliness, burst upon the view as it lay listless and hazy in the golden autumn air. Field after field of grain in shock bore witness that the present crop had been a good one. We pulled into the depot at Bozeman—the "Beautiful City"—through arches of evergreens, and, on alighting found the depot handsomely decorated, the brass band braying its welcome, the cannon adding its volume to the sound, and 500 carriages waiting to take the party for a drive through the city. Expressions of wonder were frequent as the blocks of brick business houses, the two brick graded school buildings, the churches and fine court house were passed in succession; while on every hand the evidences of wealth and tasteful culture were present. The view of the valley from the foot hills was most enchanting, and as Chicago's mayor said in his speech, "This is certainly a glorious country and God's favored paradise." At the depot, on the return from the drive, the party took in the display of fruits, grain, etc., wheat running from 40 to 100 bushels to the acre. The latter figure is not a typo's mistake. The hundred fold was shown in the bundle, with six full heads on one stalk. Barley, bright and full at forty-five bushels per acre, and oats going up to 100 bushels, and, "ye gods!" weighing fifty pounds to the bushel; immense turnips, cabbages, potatoes, etc., ad infinitum. A block of coal, bituminous, glossy and very fat, was resting its ton and a half of weight on the platform. It was raised at a mine eight miles away. Gold, silver and copper from the mountains around were shown in rich profusion; but the inevitable "All aboard" broke the charm. Here is certainly one of nature's richest storehouses. Short speeches were made by Villard, Grant and Harrison, and we sped away well satisfied with Livingston, Bozeman and the fertile Gallatin valley, with her framework of more than Alpine loveliness.

Another Bad Army Officer.

Washington Special: Gen. Ruggles, the assistant adjutant general, refused positively to give any information to-day about the defalcation and desertion of Lieut. Porter of Fort Thomas, Ariz. He said that the publication of such cases injured the army too much. The army could take care of its own bad members, and would certainly punish all caught in any malfeasance, but newspapers must not be given an opportunity of injuring the profession of arms. He claimed that such cases were rare in the army—more so than in any class where fraud is easy. When asked why a paymaster was more honest than a bank cashier, he said that the cashier had more temptation. He was constantly meeting men who would tempt him to speculate; whereas, the army paymaster has nothing but poker to tempt him. It is learned, however, that strong efforts are being made by the military authorities to capture Porter, the disgrace of Howgate's immunity being keenly felt, and the civil authorities are not to be allowed to make another failure.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

All the leading telegraph companies whose lines enter this city, including the Western Union, American Rapid and Baltimore & Ohio, have recently made an application to the district commissioners for leave to erect new lines of poles, or reset old lines in various parts of the city. These applications have all been denied upon the ground that poles and wires disfigure the streets and interfere with growing trees.

Benjamin A. Willis of New York and C. K. Davis of St. Paul are counsel in the case, and the action promises to be one of much prominence and importance.

A black and tan dog belonging to the daughter of rich Chicago parents was accidentally killed in New York a few days ago. The body was placed in a satin lined walnut coffin and sent to Chicago for burial. No such thing as a dog funeral was heard of a few years ago, but now we have about two dozen of them a year."

Then she floated around and gradually worked toward the Canadian shore, remaining in the whirlpool about twenty minutes.

Personal News Paragraphs.

There is now good ground for believing that the reason Lord Chief Justice Coleridge decided to abandon his visit to Canada, is because of the fear that he would be assassinated by Fenians. It is known at Toronto that the British government has suspected this and acted accordingly. This theory is strengthened by the fact that the Toronto lawyer who received Lord Coleridge's letter from New York, breaking his Canadian engagements, positively refused to give its contents to the press. Facts have since leaked out, which strongly corroborate the above.

DRIVING THE GOLDEN SPIKE.

Speeches by President Villard, Wm. M. Evarts, Ex-President Billings, and Others.

At about 6:15 p. m., on the 8th inst, the ceremonies of driving the last spike on the Northern Pacific Railroad, connecting St. Paul and Duluth at the eastern terminus with Portland, the western terminus, were held at a place called Gold Spike, fifty-five miles west of Helena, Montana. The occasion was regarded as a remarkable one, and as presaging a prosperous future. All present were impressed at what they beheld. Instead of the wilderness of the Rocky mountains, they beheld a mammoth pavilion capable of seating more than a thousand people, over which floated the national colors of American, German and British nations. In front, reaching to the roadbed was an extensive promenade, skirted by a platform with comfortable seats. To the right was a band stand and on it were seated the Fifth infantry band, who were to entertain them, and who came all the way from Fort Keogh. But even stronger than this evidence of civilization were the scores of vehicles and the hundreds of hardy mountaineers gathered to welcome Henry Villard. As soon as the last of the guests arrived and his party, the ceremonies were opened by President Villard, who divided the attention of the enthusiastic multitude with Gen. Grant, seated on the platform. Mr. Villard spoke for half an hour giving a brief history of the Northern Pacific railroad from its incipancy to its completion, and making honorable mention of all who had been instrumental in building this great trancontinental throughfare. He concluded his remarks amid tremendous applause, and then introduced the Hon. Wm. M. Evarts, the orator of the occasion. Mr. Evarts paid a glowing tribute to the founders of the great work. He said: "in all the long route from St. Paul, to Portland and Puget Sound the work has spoken and will speak the praises of its conception, its projection, its completion, in more impressive tones, and with a juster emphasis, than words can express." His address was long and eloquent, and was well received and heartily applauded. Mr. Evarts was followed by Secretary Teller, who spoke of the great energy and capital required to complete the various transcontinental lines, and the prospective benefits to the nation this enterprise of the Northern Pacific, along whose line of road there would be in a few years 9,000,000 people, could not be called local in its character. It was more than national. It concerned the welfare of other people. It now remains for the managers to justify in the future the wisdom of the government in what it has done and that will be if the policy announced by President Villard is carried out. Secretary Teller was followed by ex-President Billings, Gen. Grant, Sir James Harmon, Von Eisendecker, Dr. Kniss of the Berlin university, the governors of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota, Montana, Oregon and Washington territory.

At the conclusion three cheers were given. The foreign guests were then given seats on the platform by the railway, photos were taken of them, Villard and family and the most distinguished Americans. After that a horse that had helped to build the road from its inception was brought upon the platform. Then there was witnessed a most extraordinary spectacle. Three hundred men with brawny arms quickly laid thereon and drove the spikes on the thousand feet of uncompleted track except the last spike. During the progress of the work, which was witnessed by the foreigners with amazement, the band played and the people shouted. When nearly completed a cannon salute was fired by the detachment of the fifth infantry present. The last spike was finally driven home by H. C. Davis, assistant general passenger agent of the road, who drove the first spike on the opening of the road, and this spike was the same one first driven by him. The end was reached as the sun was setting behind the mountains. The enthusiasm of the people, variously estimated at from 3,000 to 5,000, was indescribable. The high reverberation, the mingled sounds of cannon and shouts of men. Thus was brought to a happy conclusion a very remarkable event in American history. The trains were reformed and guests departed, the English and a part of the Americans, including George M. Pullman and Vice President Haines, to the east, the rest west ward to Puget sound.

At St. Paul Private George Cady, of the Emmet battery, with a brass field piece, was on hand at Smith park by 9 o'clock, his gun charged with a five pound blank cartridge. At a later hour an electric wire was inserted into the vent, and this wire connected with a dynamo machine in the telegraph office of the Northern Pacific railroad. An unbroken circuit was completed between Golden Spike, sixty miles west of Helena, Montana, and New York, a total distance of 2,595 miles. The wire was cut at the scene of the day's festivities, 1,215 miles west of St. Paul. One end of the wire was affixed to the silver sledge hammer, the other to the golden spike, and when the first blow was struck, a circuit would be completed, and the blow "ticked" instantaneously in Portland, St. Paul, Chicago, Boston, Buffalo, and New York.

It was expected that the last spike would be driven between the hours of 10 and 12 a. m., but the watchers at the instrument in the Northern Pacific offices in St. Paul, and at the cannon in Smith Park stood at their posts until 6:18 p. m., railway time, when the first "tick" was heard on the instrument which was switched into connection with the cannon. In less than two seconds! Boom! went the gun in Smith park, joyfully pealed the bells, and shrill and deep blew the whistles in the city of St. Paul. The last spike was driven. The Northern Pacific railroad, conceived nineteen years ago, was completed. The great work had come to a successful completion.

Statue of Lafayette in Paris.

The unveiling of the statue of Lafayette took place on the 6th inst., in the presence of an immense crowd, despite a severe rain storm. The streets were decorated with American and French flags, and triumphal arches were erected over the principal streets. Among the distinguished persons present were Messrs. Morton, United States minister at Paris and Sargent, United States minister to Germany. Morel, president of the Lafayette memorial committee, performed the ceremony of unveiling the statue, amid plaudits from the multitude and artillery. Minister Morton, speaking, said he was enforced to be present and assist at this tribute to the memory of Lafayette, as he desired to express the affection felt by the people of the United States for one who, next to Washington, had awakened the gratitude of all American hearts as an ardent lover of liberty. He had advocated the supremacy of law, and his struggle was for the establishment of constitutional freedom. Would that he could now see the noble result of his work. America had attained that prosperity and splendor which Lafayette had predicted, America was never more united than on this occasion; and may the friendship which Washington and Lafayette formed remain forever unbroken between the two republics. Senator Lafayette returned thanks for the honor conferred upon his ancestor.

Greeley's Farm Sold.

The famous farm of Horace Greeley has been sold by Israel E. Haight, trustee, in pursuance of a decree of the supreme court dated June 4, 1883. Horace Greeley, by his will, directed the sale and division of the proceeds among his children. Mrs. Smith, his daughter, who was named as executrix in his will, did not follow out the instructions, and after her death, Gabrielle M. Greeley the surviving daughter brought action against Col. Smith and children to have the estate sold as directed by the will. Only one bid was made. Gabrielle Greeley bought it for $10,000. The property, with the buildings, drainage and cultivation, cost Horace Greeley over $70,000. It comprises over seventy-eight acres. A few neighbors were present prepared to purchase, but would not bid against Miss Greeley.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

MINNESOTA STATE FAIR.

The Exhibition this Year at Owatonna a Credit to the State and Well Patronized by the People.

The state fair opened at Owatonna on Monday of last week, but, as usual, most of the day was occupied in preparations for what was to come. The entries were large and gave assurance that the exhibition would be worthy of public support.

Tuesday—called governor's day—there was an attendance of 6,000 people. Five long tables had been spread and bountifully filled with the good things of life, conspicuous among which was the barbecued ox presented by A. H. Bullis, one of the leading cattle breeders of the state. At the head of the long tables was placed a slightly raised platform and short table, at which was seated Gov. Hubbard, Col. Clark W. Thompson, president of the society, ex-Senator M. S. Wilkinson, ex-Representative Mark H. Dunnell, and several others.

At the conclusion of the banquet, President Thompson arose and in a few words introduced Gov. Hubbard, who was received with applause. After thanking the assemblage for the cordial greeting extended him, the governor proceeded at some length to speak of the benefits to the state of such exhibitions as he had witnessed on the grounds.

There were the tangible, visible and solid evidences of the progress made by Minnesota in every branch of industry. It had been charged that we were boastful and extravagant in our language in regard to our products and capabilities, but he denied the soft impeachment, and in refutation of the same pointed to the bountifully spread tables and the splendid exhibit made of all kinds of products. At the conclusion of the governor's remarks ex-Senator Wilkinson was introduced and made an earnest, eloquent speech laudatory of the farmer and agricultural interests.

Speeches were made by various other gentlemen. The horse show attracted great attention, and if the managers of the State fair had not been able to secure any other attraction beyond the cattle show they certainly would have no reason to complain of the exhibition. The display of Shorthorns, Devons, Holsteins, Hereford's, Jerseys, Polled Angus, etc., is something for the society to be proud of, and proves that the great Northwest is not a whit behind its Eastern neighbors in the matter of fine stock raising.

Col. R. P. McGlincy of Elgin, Ill., secretary of the dairy board of trade of that city and also of the Northwestern Dairymen's association, attended the fair, and speaks in complimentary terms of the cattle exhibits. The races, of course attracted the crowd in the afternoon but do not require special mention.

Wednesday had been set apart as Faribault Day, an the people of that city, to the number of fully 1,000, arrived by special train at an early hour, and were soon thronging all over the grounds. Every regular train brought hundreds of visitors, and by 2 p. m. fully 12,000 people were on the grounds. During the morning there was quite an addition to the stock, machinery and agricultural exhibit, and every department was fully represented. Everything passed off without a single accident or disturbance, and a better natured better behaved, and it may be added, better pleased crowd of 12,000 people probably never met together in Minnesota or any other state than that assembled upon the fair grounds. The line of stabling for cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, etc., extended entirely around the grounds, from the north to the south side of the race course. For a part of the distance the line of stalls was double. The arrangements for exhibiting the stock was very convenient, both for exhibitors and visitors. About midway of the grounds was located the machinery exhibit, which was quite extensive.

The main hall or exposition building was situated in the center of the grounds. It was two stories high, and its size is 72 by 140 feet. Just below the exposition building was the grand stand or amphitheater, 700 feet long, with a seating capacity of 3,000. The display of blooded cattle was the largest collection of valuable animals ever seen in Minnesota, and the same may be said of horses. The display of sheep and hogs was fair. It was a very enjoyable day to visitors and all went away satisfied and in good humor.

Thursday was another gala day, and 12,000 visitors were present, including distinguished people from all parts of the state with a sprinkling from Wisconsin and Iowa. Notwithstanding the immense crowd and the excitement incident to such an occasion there was not a single drunken man in the crowd and not a single case of pocket picking or crookedness.

Some of the exhibitors and friends of the secretary, Mr. R. C. Judson, took this occasion to express their appreciation of the kindness and courtesy he had shown them, by presenting him with a magnificent set of silverware costing $150.

A set of solid silver knives and forks was also given to Mr. J. T. Howe, the superintendent of machinery department, for his constant attention to their wants.

Friday was gloomy overhead and the attendance was not so large as on previous days. The judges in the different divisions were hard at work and completed their labors. Financially the fair was a success, and has demonstrated that Owatonna is a good point at which to hold the state fair. Its citizens have labored faithfully and well, at great personal sacrifice and expense, to make the twenty-fifth annual exhibition creditable to the state, against untold circumstances, over which they could have no control.

Twice were the buildings and sheds destroyed or injured by the elements, yet they succeeded in making all the necessary provisions for the largest and best exhibit ever given in the state. Another year, under more propitious circumstances and the added knowledge of what is necessary for the convenience of so important a display, there is every reason to believe that the twenty-sixth annual fair will be still more successful. Hon. Clark W. Thompson the president, and Mr. Judson, the secretary of the society, are entitled to much credit, and are very popular with exhibitors.

The wheat house of W. Ehle, at Morristown, operated by S. M. West, was burned on the 6th inst. It is supposed to be the work of an incendiary. The building was insured for $800 in the Rhode Island Underwriters' association. There was 1,000 bushels of wheat in the elevator, fully insured.

Articles of incorporation of the St. Cloud Electric Light and Power company have been filled with the secretary of state. The corporation begins Sept. 1 and continues for thirty years. The limit of indebtedness is fixed at $10,000. J. H. Woolsey, F. H. Dam, L. A. Evans, J. P. Wilson and Lewis Clark are named as the first board of directors.

The Waseca postoffice was broken into on the 6th inst., and an attempt made to blow open the safe by drilling a hole through the door. A broken drill found in the hole probably accounts for the failure. About $450 in stamps and some cash were in the safe at the time. There is no clue to the perpetrators.

FAIR NOTES.

The Polk County Fair opened auspiciously on Tuesday, the weather being all that could be desired. The day was spent in receiving and arranging exhibits and little was done in the way of amusements; however, the receipts of the day, we are told, amounted to $700 On Wednesday morning, bright and early, the gates were opened and the people began to throng the grounds and the fun commenced in earnest. Base ball and racing was the order of the day. Our reporter was early on the grounds in order to make the grand rounds before the crush and jam attendant upon a great crowd should come. Commencing at Agricultural Hall he wended his way through the grand display of the Golden No. 1 Hard in the sheaf and in the half bushel, and the display of oats and barley that cannot be beat in any country. In the vegetable kingdom there were mammoth potatoes, (the Beauty of Hebron leading the display,) turnips as big as a bushel basket or smaller; beets, that beat all creation and the Devils Lake; onions, large and strong enough to draw tears of compassion from the eyes of the strongest; carrots of mammoth size; beans that all who have bean there will admit are the boss; Kohl rabbi, cauliflowers and cabbages to beat the Dutch; watermelons that make one's mouth water unavailingly; celery such as you always read about but seldom see, and, in fact, a fine display of everything in the vegetable kingdom that can be raised in this climate, not to forget the graceful tomato, which blushed in beauty and great profusion, abundantly proving that Polk County can get there every time. Having spent considerable time profitably in Agricultural Hall our reporter left that bee hive of industry wherein are collected the fruits of a summer's toil, but not before he had gazed upon the exhibit made by our nurseryman, Mr. F. T. Haseltine, which is a large and fine one, reflecting great credit upon that enterprising gentleman. Notable among this collection was a fine large crab-apple tree, with several apples hanging on it which showed a thrifty and vigorous growth. This tree was raised from a seedling in the home nursery in Crookston. His rhubarb display was a magnificent one. Passing out of Agricultural hall our reporter next entered the art gallery from the south. On the left was Charlie Davis' display of musical instruments, and sewing machines; next comes Lambert and Mathews with a fine display of furniture; then the C. O. D. store demands the attention of all, next is the display of Dyer & Howard's musical instruments of which C. A. Davis is agent; Forsberg & Kertson made a fine display from their photographic gallery which is much admired and is worthy of it. Then the eye rests upon a little darling of a coal oil stove, and another stove that is not a coal oil stove, displayed by E. M. Walsh; next in order is E. M. Walsh's sewing machines, one of which is operated by a blind lady, a graduate of the Iowa State Institute, at Kenton, Ioa; It is really wonderful to see this lady manipulate the sewing machine. She does it apparently as well as though she could see perfectly and it would be hard for one to detect her sad calamity by simply watching her work if he were not to see her eyes. Passing on from the fine display made by E. M. Walsh one encounters the organs and pianos entered by H. A. Dusso which are truly creditable and make a fine display. After an interesting survey of the art gallery and seeing many things that can not be mentioned from the simple fact that the owner's name did not appear, our reporter left the Art Gallery and entered Floral Hall to examine, criticise and find fault with the display made by the ladies and here he was completely at sea. Amid the multiplicity of lovely objects that met his eye he found not one that he could pick a flaw with and to tell the honest truth was not sufficiently posted in the mysteries of such fine arts to be able to criticise at all. Mark Twain once said that to be able to write intelligibly upon any topic he must know simply nothing about it—i. e. the less he knew about it the better he could write it up, but then, Mark Twain never saw the beautiful display our ladies have made and as we are not Mark Twain we had better let up before we get into an inextricable tangle. Suffice it to say that our reporter was fully satisfied with the display the ladies have made. Once more outside, we went for the cattle, and sheep and the hog pens, and right here we would like to remark that the idea of having an exhibit and no name that a fellow can see to find out who owns anything is reprehensible. We saw some fine colts, and some fine Alderney, Durhams and other breeds, but we can't say much about them as we found no one to interview. In machinery hall we found a magnificent display of nice buggies, carriages, wagons and farm machinery from the McKinnon Bros., establishment. Their goods are No. 1 and warranted. A. N. Hopkins & Co., exhibit a fine lot of buggies and carriages from the Newark Manufacturing Co's works, of Newark N. Y. The spokes, felloes and ather wood-work used in the construction of these buggies are of second-growth hickory and fully warranted. The New Era grader company shows a sample grader and ditcher. The Deering Company's agent has a self-binder and the Plano folks show one of their machines. This much of the great show our reporter was enabled to learn without being importunate. We could suggest an improvement in the manner of conducting these exhibits which would be to have some one in attendance, or in lieu of that a card stating owner's name and other facts which exhibitors like to have known.

MINOR NOTES.

The Crookston base-ball club got rather badly beaten by the Grand Forks club—11 to 3. It should be stated, however that our club has but recently organized and have had but little practice.

Warninger's little bay got away with the Ellis horse in the trotting match.

The wheel of fortune seems to be doing a rushing business on the grounds.

You can get a splendid dinner on the grounds at the Catholic Ladies' Restaurant.

Billy Adams, of St. Vincent, an old-timer, is taking in the fair.

The Grand Forks train on Wednesday brought in crowds for the fair.

Jim Grey, of Fergus Falls is on the grounds daily.

Jim Waring lost a wagon-tire and side tracked his lead near the fair grounds. No one hurt and all happy.

The chief attraction of Forsberg & Kertson's display is Tom Morris' picture. "None see it but to love it none mention but to praise!"

Mr. Kennedy, formerly of Kennedy & Steege, is on the grounds this week.

Henry Steege exhibits a threshing crew in full blast, threshing oats. This exhibit is in a field adjoining the fair grounds however.

A ripple of excitement appeared on Wednesday eve but did not pan out. It took place on the base ball ground near the judges stand.

The grand stand is filled daily.

To morrow is the big day. Dont fail to get there.

The best of order is preserved on the grounds.

G. M. Barber's horse took the cake in the 2:50 trot on Wednesday.

Papin, the milk-man got away with the running race on Wednesday.

The call-bell at the judges stand could not stand the pressure and broke on Wednesday. It was suspended from the railing by a string and made to do its duty which it does in a very much cracked voice.

The track is in excellent condition and the horses can show up to excellent advantage.

The equestrienne ten mile race occurs to-morrow, (Friday.)

From the Times.

Last week Mr. Emerson lost a little girl with diphtheria. His remaining two children who were suffering from the same disease are on the road to recovery.

Mr. Harris, assisted by Mr. Kennedy and others, built a house in three days and on the third day, the family moved in.

Postmaster Burkee received a letter Thursday night from the Postoffice Department at Washington, announcing that the contract for carrying the mail to and from this place is let to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad company.

At the special meeting in District No. 102, it was voted to issue two thousand dollar bonds for building and furn'shing a school house. The town site company gave block twenty-two as a school house site. The house will be erected as soon as possible.

Mr. McClaren is the gentleman who now has charge of a crew of men building the new elevator or grain house at this place. The size of the structure is forty by sixty feet, with a capacity of holding fifteen thousand bushels of grain. It is owned and will be managed by a stock company, of which Mr. Sterrit, formerly of the firm of Childs, Sterrit & Hill. is the business manager.

Old But Good.

An editor in Chicago recently ordered a pair of trowsers from the tailor. On trying them on they proved to be several inches too long. It being late on Saturday night, the tailor shop was closed, and the editor took the trowsers to his wife, and asked her to cut them off and hem them over. The good lady, whose dinner had, perhaps, disagreed with her, brusquely refused. The same result followed on application to the wife's sister and the eldest daughter, but before bedtime the wife, relenting, took the pants and, cutting off six inches from the legs, hemmed then up nicely and restored them to the closet. Half an hour later her daughter, seized with compunction for her unfilial conduct, took the trowsers, and cutting off six inches, hemmed and replaced them. Finally the sister-in-law felt the pangs of conscience, and she, too, performed an additional surgical operation on the garment. When the editor appeared at breakfast on Sunday, the family thought a Highland chieftain had arrived.

What Does It Profit.

Minneapolis Weekly.

Mr. Judah P. Benjamin has now, at upwards of seventy, retired from the practice of law in England where he took refuge, a penniless, briefless advocate, at the downfall of the southern confederacy, he himself having been one of the main pillars of the giddy structure. His English law practice has brought him a very large fortune. He avers that his sole object during his life in England has been to make money, that he has toiled early and late denying himself rest or recreation, setting aside all consideration of a personal or social nature. Now that the money is earned with which to enjoy life, and the burden of work is laid down, he may have rest in fullest measure, but he finds himself afflicted with an incurable heart disease liable to prove fatal at any moment.

Mr. Benjamin's experience is but another warning against overwork against placing one's sole earthly happiness in money-getting. Life and health are so uncertain that the true wisdom lies in enjoying the good things of this world as one goes along. And the world offers things incomparably better than money, which amassed beyond a certain limit is nothing but vexation and embarrassment, The golden mean, here as elsewhere, is the best. Enough is as good as a feast.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, SEPT. 13.

LOCAL NEWS.

A sharp frost on Friday night.

Dave Williams wouldn't be a Mormon under any consideration.

At Fort Totten last Thursday night some of our boys were put into the guardhouse—to sleep.

M. E. Filiatrault commenced threshing his grain last week and we are told that it is yielding 23 bushels per acre.

Simmons' dray team took a lively spin around the city on Saturday and and landed in safety doing but little damage.

Our former fellow-towns man, John Weeks, boarded the excurson train at Lakota and went along with the jolly crowd.

The conductors were indefatigable in there attentions to their guest, ever watchful to see that they were comfortable and happy.

Mr. George, of Medical Hall lost his hat on the excursion and had to borrow one from a friend which fitted him as well as a bushel basket would have done.

John McLean is a singer. It came out on the excursion. His voice is sweeter than a bull-frog's and he can get nearer to a tune than the melodious mule—a little.

Several of Warren's prominent citizens took in the conductors excursion among whom were Ethan Allen, A. E. Flint, J. B. Titus, E. W. Rossman and I L. Holley.

At Larimore last week we met our old friend L. N. Ashem, formerly traveling agent for the Fargo Argus. L. N. is now in the machine business and is having a good trade.

Large quantities of grain have gone into the stack this week, the humming threshing machine is pounding out the No. 1 Hard and the fall plowing is getting along lively,

The Devils Lake country is a great country for ducks. Hundreds of them were seen upon every pond of water along the route and there were thousands upon the lake.

Our Polk County crops, compared with what we saw enroute to Devils Lake are the best in the Northwest. If one wants to be perfectly satisfied with this county he should make that trip and see the thin display.

An attempt was made last Thursday night to burn the Devils Lake bank and Lake View hotel but the fire was discovered in time to prevent a disastrous conflagration. Those fire bugs ought to be shot down on sight.

An incipient blaze was discovered in Max Ericsson's barn last Friday just in time to be extinguished before it could get beyond control. Some urchins, playing with matches came near having more fun than they bargained for.

Mr. P. E. Thompson, the postmaster at Barnesville came up to take in the excursion. Mr. Thompson is a flourishing merchant and owns a large share of the town-site of Barnsville. If you want to buy valuable property cheap write to him for his prices for city lots

Our band covered themselves all over with glory (and dust) while on the excursion. They received many compliments for their excellent playing and well deserved them all. That reminds us that they really ought to have a fine uniform and it would be a handsome thing for the city to do to buy and present them suitable uniforms.

Dune Morris tried to dive through his hat—that nice shiny plug. But it was in a good cause. He was trying to rescue the passengers on the little tug, bringing them to the big steamer when, as the scow come near, the waves gave her a toss against the boat which caused Dune to pitch into the hurricane deck, mashing that plug hat as flat as a pancake. Dune spoiled that hat but has the consciousness of having nobly done his duty as a wrecker.

Mr. Knute Tedmanson, of Maple Lake was in the city on Saturday last. He brought along a few cheeses which he has made this summer and a sample which he left at the JOURNAL office convinces us that good cheese can be made in this country and that he knows how to make 'em. Mr. T. is an old hand at the business and he talks of putting up a cheese factory up at Maple Lake just as soon as there are cows enough up there to run it.

Notice.

I desire to inform the public that although the firm of Haseltine Bros., has dissolved, I shall continue the nursery business on the old grounds, in Crookston, Minn. That E. W. Haseltine who has been one of the firm has his share of nursery stock growing on my grounds in Crookston which he is selling out, but has no nursery as he has stated in his advertisement. All orders sent to my address will be promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

Most Respectfully,

[20-tf] F. T. HASELTINE.

Taken Up.

Came into my enclosure Thursday September 6th, one roan pony, four white feet, white face, about 7 or 8 years old. The owner is requested to call at Schrader's Livery stable, Crookston, prove property and take her away.

The Conductors' Excursion.

The first annual excursion of Maxwell Division No. 75, which was given on Thursday last, was a grand success in every particular. The train, consisting of seven coaches and a baggage coach, left this city about 6 o'clock a. m., well loaded with the guests of the jolly conductors. After the train had left Mallory we counted noses to see how many were on board and found that there were 200. Arriving at Grand Forks four more coaches were added to accommodate the crowd awaiting at the depot and those who might get on at stations further west. We were informed that something over 200 people, including the cadet band in full uniform got on. At every station along the route the party received accessions to their numbers until, when the train reached Devils Lake City fully 500 people were on board. A short stay was made in the city to allow those who felt so inclined to get dinner and then all who possessed sufficient sand to brave the possibilities of a rough lake got on board the little steamer Minnie H. and steamed away for Fort Totten. Arriving at that place in safety the party disembarked and went up to the soldiers quarters, which we found to be comfortable stone and brick buildings about two stories high, built to form a large square. This is the headquarters of the Indian Reservation and the Indian agent has a comfortable residence near the soldiers' quarters. After viewing every point of interest and listening to an eloquent speech delivered by Judge Cox, of Grand Forks, the party re-embarked and then it was learned that owing to an accident that had happened to the boat, it was impossible to return to Devils' Lake City that night and the prospect of remaining on the boat during a long cheerless night was anything but cheering. In this dilemma the Indian Agent came to the rescue and offered to furnish comfortable quarters for the ladies who were escorted up to the chapel given a blanket apiece and told to bunk down on the floor and be happy. A fire was built in the great stove and everything made as comfortable as possible. The gentlemen, composing the party then went skirmishing about among the soldiers and most of them were handsomely provided for, though some of them preferred to stay upon the boat and did so. In the morning, everything having been repaired the little Minnie H. steamed back to Devils Lake City where an elegant repast, given by the conductors to their guests awaited the excursionists at the Benham house and it is quite needless to say that it was heartily enjoyed by one and all as only hungry mortals know how. At 11 a. m. "All Aboard" was shouted and the train left for home which place, for those who live in Crookston, was reached at about 6 p. m. One drawback, when the lake was reached prevented many from seeing much of the scenery. It was so cold and windy that most were obliged to remain in the cabin and those who did seek the decks did so at the expense of personal comfort. The lake is a pretty body of water but being pretty salt its waters are good for little else than to look at and navigate boats upon. Devils Lake City has grown quite rapidly and is quite a town. The land around is stony and sandy and looks too light to be a successful wheat country. The citizens, however, seem to feel perfect confidence in the greatness of the future of their country and we are perfectly willing that they should. Between Grand Forks and Bartlett there are some pretty good crops, notably around Larimore at which place we met the Hon. Theodore Holton, formerly a member of the Minnesota Legislature, from Becker County who is in the machine business. He told us that he had sold this season 63 Plano self-binders and that the several firms there had done equally as well. He said that wheat was turning out splendidly and thought it was not wild to estimate the total yield at 20 bushels per acre. The crops all along the route look fair but do not begin to compare with the Polk County crops. The conductors did their best to entertain their guests and succeeded so well that everybody wore a pleased and happy expression even under the rather trying state of things at Fort Totten and all returned well pleased with the trip and the splendid manner in which they had been entertained. All honor to Maxwell Division No. 75 long may it wave and may we all be there to see and enjoy the time of their second annual excursion.

Another Appearance.

On Saturday night last W. R. Brooks, of Phelps, N. Y., discovered a singular object in the constellation of Draco. He was not certain as to its real character, but on Monday night Prof. Lewis Swift, Director of the Warner Observatory at Rochester, N. Y., verified it by means of the large Warner telescope as being a comet. It is quite large nearly round and moving slowly westward. Mr. Brooks received a special prize of $250 from Mr. Warner some two months since, and if there is no prior claimant will be entitled to the $200 prize on the present discovery.

Herald, Grand Forks:—Last evening between the hours of 6 and 7 o'clock a most beautiful mirage was to be seen from town. Farm houses and trees lying some five miles distant from us were made to appear as if one-tenth that distance. The home of Timothy Sullivan, some three miles away, was brought so near that the inmates were plainly seen through the windows taking their evening meal—and by the way, they seemed to enjoy it, too.

The St. Hilaire Spectator takes the JOURNAL to task because, in our issue of August 30th we noticed the townsite fight going on up there and remarked that the Times said that the Crocker & Cundy addition was busted. The Spectator says that we do an act of injustice to the proprietors but gives us the credit of being honest about it, simply being misled. Then the Spectator indulges in a long tirade of abuse against the Times man, Mr. Steenerson which is none of our business and after that says that the Addition is all solid yet. Well, we are truly glad of that for Mr. Crocker (the only member of the firm with whom we are acquainted) is a friend of ours, one whom we should be loth to see lose big money on his investment up there and we are sorry to see a red-hot town-site fight inaugurated in the start as it will hurt the interests of the village as a whole, and brother McKenzie may risk his bottom dollar that the JOURNAL does not crave a hand in the fight pro or con either to the injury or interest of either part or any individual member thereof. What we said was simply intended as a matter of news, and was, we think drawn very mildly. In concluding its article the Spectator says:

> Let us say in conclusion that Crocker, Cundy & Nelson's addition to St. Hilaire was never in a more prosperous condition than it is at present. The only building empty is the saloon building just vacated by C. C. Utzinger. Several new buildings are in course of erection and all the business men in town are doing a good trade and are perfectly satisfied with their location. We trust the JOURNAL will look this matter up and after satisfying itself that it had been led astray will take the first opportunity of correcting any erroneous impressions which may have been left in the minds of its many readers by the reading of the above item.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1883. NO. 21

DR. HALE, of Edinburgh,

Editor of

"Health and Home"

Is Prepared to Receive a Few Patients troubled with

Chronic OR Nervous Maladies

At his office, Room 29, in the

LINTON HOUSE, - Crookston, Minnesota,

Until Saturday Noon, Sept. 29th, 1883.

DR. HALE has for many years made a specialty of three classes of chronic ailments, viz: "Diseases of the Throat and Lungs," "Diseases of Women," and "Diseases of Men." Being an Eclectic Physician, the Dr. administers no mercury, zinc, lead or other nauseous or mineral drugs. His treatment consists wholly in the use of 'vegetable remedies, and he Guarantees a Cure in every case he undertakes.

Diseases of Throat and Lungs.

Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, which destroy more lives than all other ailments combined, succumb almost miraculously under Dr. Hale's vegetable treatment. To the pale and emaciated, to those whose lungs are being eaten away by a destructive ulceration, and to those whose violent coughing, profuse expectoration, and sleepless nights, which make life to be more of a curse than a blessing—to all such, Dr. Hale can give immediate relief, and, with a short course of treatment, can effect a radical and permanent cure.

CATARRH

For the benefit of those who are now free from the more serious stages of this disease and to prevent them becoming so afflicted, the following primary symptoms are given, in hopes that the reader will be able to discern the commencement of this life-destroying malady, and thus avert its consequences: Cold in the head, frequent sneezing, pain across the temples, a watery discharge from the nostrils, hawking and raising of little offensive crusts of mucus, a continuous dropping of mucus into the throat, difficulty of breathing and speaking, dullness, and impairment of the senses of hearing, taste and smell. These are the earliest symptoms of this disease, and if the sufferer will attend to them when they first make their appearance, it will cause a saving of many dollars, and save many from a premature grave.

CONSUMPTION.

If the Catarrh, has been neglected, or as is very often the case, received improper treatment, Consumption will be the result; and that, as a rule, means death! Notwithstanding the prevalence of the idea that "Consumption is incurable," Dr. Hale will undertake to cure all cases of Consumption in its first stages. Many think they have Consumption when they have not; many believe they are incurable when they are not; and many die when they should not. Dr. Hale can detect the slightest Disease of the Chest and Lungs, or any internal organ at the first examination, and tells the patient frankly whether the case is incurable or not, and under no circumstances will the Dr. undertake a case unless he can guarantee a cure.

Diseases of Women.

Ladies whose cases have been given up as incurable, are earnestly requested to call upon Dr. Hale. His many years of experience have taught him that there is no ailment peculiar to the uterine system which is incurable—not even barrenness—and all the many displacements of the womb, such as Falling, Anteversion and Retroversion, can certainly be cured without the use of pessaries, tents, sponges or supporters of any kind. Ulceration and inflammation of the womb, which produce dizziness, loss of appetite, languor, weakness, lassitude, emaciation, miscarriages, headaches, indigestion, dyspepsia and consumption, Dr. Hale also guarantees to cure. No matter how chronic the disease, no matter how many physicians have termed it "incurable," (so long as there's life, there hope) each sufferer should call at once and have a consultation, which is free to all, and learn whether the case is curable or not. If incurable, you will be told so, at the first interview, and no charge whatever will be made.

Diseases of Men.

Dr. Hale's great specialty is "Diseases of Men." There are many troubled with a too frequent evacuation of the bladder, accompanied by a slight smarting and burning sensation; and a Sediment often forms in the urine which by neglect produces Impotency. This usually occurs in the middle of life. The urine frequently changes in color, being at one time very clear, and at other times a dark red. When these changes are taking place, and a sediment appears, it denotes the second stage of Seminal Weakness, of which many die, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Hale guarantees in all such cases a thorough and effectual cure. Impotency or loss of power in the Genital Organs, often the result of Semial weakness, is more obstinate, yet it invariably yields after a few week's treatment. The old venereal virus which is implanted in the systems of those who have had gonorrhœa or syphilis improperly treated and have used zinc, potassium or mercury, can have their systems thoroughly freed from their baneful effects. The root and herb treatment of Dr. Hale will thoroughly eliminate the last vestige of the syphilitic virus, though it may have been in the system for fifty years. The young man who has been guilty of Youthful Indiscretions, self-abuse, or excesses of any kind, and who now finds his nerves weakened, has lascivious dreams and nocturnal emissions, is debilitated, emaciated, weak, melancholy, absent-minded, dull, listless and finds life a burden, can be fully restored to his original health.

☞ A Cure is guaranteed in every case undertaken.

Only one interview required in the majority of cases. Further treatment can be continued at home without interrupting business. All consultations strictly confidential. Special appointments made to see patients out of office hours.

Consultation Free. Thorough Examination and advice $5.00.

Office Hours: From 10 to 4 and 6 to 8. Sundays 9 to 11 a. m.

Dr. Hale's Head Office in the United States is 162 Broadway, N. Y. where communications should be addressed by invalids who fail to see him during his tour.

The parsonage and church will be heated by steam and will be fine buildings when completed.

If you want an extra good supper go to the new Congregational Kirke for it this evening. The Gineral and Mis Washington will hev a big spread, and assisted by that long, slab sided ingin, Pow-hat-off, and his darter Poky, will hev the table sot fur all ther sisters an' ther cousins and ther ants, more especially for ther ant-sisters. We hev ben told that a big time is on the carpet and a big effort made to raise enough continental currency to buy some benches to put into the meetin house to set down on of a Sunday, and mebbe git enough to put glass winders into the housen so't the little board doors kin be dispensed with Let every body get thar't early kandlelight and get a good meal o' vittals.

Last Saturday, in company with county treasurer, O. H. Lucken, we took a trip to Maple Lake. En-route the farmers were all busy in the grain fields, stacking or threshing and we found that work pretty well advanced and considerable fall plowing done. Arrived at the residence of Fred H. Date we found the prettiest place we have seen in the country. His house is located in a grove on a high bluff, gradually sloping toward the lake and a bay, by which it is surrounded on three sides. Here, besides Mr. Date's family, we found Leon, Fletcher and Clinton Walker, the young sons of Mr. T. B. Walker, out for a hunt and a good time in the country and they seemed to be enjoying it to the fullest extent. Mr. Date has a fine sail boat and a number of row boats on the lake and is preparing to make a summer resort at that point than which no better place can be found in the country. The lake is a beautiful sheet of water, with gravelly shores, and chuck full of fish. While we were out the game did seem to be very shy; the presence of Lucken and that new dog seemed to inspire them with awe—at all events game was so bashful that Lucken did not get a chance to introduce his dog to many of the fair, frail chickens, ducks and sich like. He saw a mink lazily swimming in the bay and was so mad because it wasn't a duck that he hauled up his old fusee and filled the mink chuck full of shot which so disheartened his minkship that he was easily caught before recovering from his astonishment. We saw but few of our Maple Lake friends as our stay was short and all the time we had to spare was spent upon the lake. The soil around the lake, we observed was quite sandy making a quick, early soil better adapted for stock raising than for wheat, though we are informed that all the wheat raised there so far has been of excellent quality and quantity. With plenty of woodlands, affording protection in winter, and plenty of pure, cold water no better dairy county can be found in the Northwest, and we observed with pleasure that farmers are paying considerable attention to stock-raising.

Our fine weather took a set-back this morning. To-day is what might be termed slightly moist.

Wm. Marin has received his new threshing machine, a straw-burner. He now has two machines in the field.

Peter Misgen Dave Robinson, Charles Truax and others started for their claims on the thirteen townships.

Larimore Pioneer:—[S. E. Chapin and C. Van Housen, two worthy boys of Crookston, were in Larimore a few days ago. They had been out to Mr. Chapin's No. 1 hard farm northeast of town.

And now it is Andrew Eiken who is setting up the cigars all owing to the safe arrival of a ten pound boy wasnt a circumstance to what he weighs himself. He is undecided how many tons he does weigh and dare not risk the scales to find out.

Peter Cornelius has finished threshing his wheat and findes a yield of a trifle over 18 bushels per acre No. 1 Hard wheat. He had 280 acres in wheat and got 5200 bushels of wheat, machine measure. That may overrun sufficient to make it 19 bushels by weight.

Dr. Hale, Edinburgh, Scotland, is giving a series of interesting medical lectures at Ericsson's Hall this week. The doctor is prepared to attend to all chronic cases at his rooms at the Linton house and guarantee a cure. See his broad gauge ad elsewhere announcing this and other facts.

Mr. W. J. Troupe has returned to our city and is now prepared to fill all orders for his new medicine, the "Wonder of the World." Mr. Troupe was in the city several weeks ago and while here sold a great deal of this medicine and, so far as we can learn, it gave universal satisfaction. If you have not secured a bottle it would be a good idea to do so at once.

The Polk County Fair was a success, financially, and should be encouraging for the future. The racing was fine, some of our local horses showing a speed that surprised their friends. The twenty mile race was called off at the end of the fifth mile owing to darkness. Miss Slee, of Warren, showed herself a splendid rider, but being unfortunate in the selection of horses she was beaten. She is a beautiful rider and won many compliments.

Mr. Chas. Churchill has rented his residence from October 1st. for the winter and will go with his family out to his new farm in the thirteen towns. Charlie will make the boss farmer; we think we see him now, whoa, haw, gee-ing his oxen around the potato field or erst while the festive turnip patch. He has promised, us soon as he thaws out in the spring to fetch us a mess of winter radishes and some winter wheat flour. Here's "Ho!" Charles.

The Saw Mill.

Quietly, so quietly that many know nothing about it, work was commenced upon the foundation for the Walker saw mill and is now being pushed as rapidly as possible. It is Mr. Walker's intention to get the mill up and enclosed before cold weather sets in so that it may be completed and ready to run as soon as the logs can be got at in the spring. This great enterprise is at last secured and this city and vicinity has ample reason to rejoice in the fact. Those who have so faithfully labored for the accomplishment of this object as well as all who have contributed to that end may now rejoice together and be exceedingly glad in the bright prospects of the grand future that is now dawning upon us. This mill will cost at least $100,000 to build and that is a trifle compared with the whole amount of capital which will be employed in its operation. And this is doubtless only the beginning. With this great enterprise in our midst, with our large flouring mills, our machine shop and foundry and our planing mills already secured and some of them in operation other manufacturing interests will naturally center here and soon we shall be known not only for the superior excellence of our No. 1 Hard wheat but also for our great manufacturing interests.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

ONLY A MINER.

Tremont is a pleasant little village overlooking the "Western sea." Everything there, is rough and stony, and even the inhabitants are, to all appearances, as rough and stony as their native rocks. But underneath those slaty fields lie the rich veins of metal, and in those rough hearts is a vein of human feeling and Christain charity, far, far purer than much that passes as such in the fashionable worlds, where tinkling bells daily summon rich dowagers to church in their gorgeous chariots.

The children of Tremont were tripping lightly to school after their holidays, along the hard slaty paths. It was, indeed, with no "creeping like snail unwillingness to school" kind of motion on this occasion, as all were full of expectation, almost of joy, for they were to have that day a new mistress, one whom they all knew, and who had, in fact, been one of themselves.

Margaret Powel had been born in Tremont, where she had attended the school, first as pupil, then as pupil-teacher. Thence she had gone to college, and a vacancy having occurred, she had been appointed mistress down their in her own native village. Her father had worked there, man and boy, in the mines for upwards of forty years, and he still continued to follow this same occupation. The children, therefore, all knew Margaret. Their memories of her were pleasant, and hence they tripped joyously to school, where they admired their new mistress, who, in their eyes, was certainly as learned besides being as pretty as a princess. When they, therefore, returned home at midday, many were the exclamations of "Isn't she pretty!" "Isn't she nice!" and so on, among the youngsters.

Many others besides the school children were in love with Margaret, for she had budded into womanhood since she had left Tremont, and now her beauty had taken the young men by surprise. For some time Margaret found it far from agreeable to have so many admirers, but by dint of good management, by the falling off of those who felt they had "no chance," and through other circumstances, her circle of avowed adorers became reduced to two—Joseph Tregear and Tom Polglaze.

Both of these young men were receiving good wages in the mines, and had opportunities of rising to higher positions as inspectors, and so forth; both, too, were steady, and had saved a little money. It was long, however, before Margaret herself made it known which of them she preferred; in fact, so far as that goes, neither could for a long time boast of the smallest favor. Other girls called Margaret a flirt, but in this they wronged her. The simple fact was that Margaret, not yet tird of being her own mistress, endeavored so to order her ways that neither Joseph Tregear, Tom Polglaze, nor any other suitor might have the slightest reason to be jealous of a rival.

Tregear, however, had the good sense to see that neither he nor Polglaze was nearly so well educated as Margaret and he well understood that it is a bad omen when the husband has to look up to the wife in the matter of learning. He accordingly bought books and became an earnest midnight student. In fact, he tried in every way to render himself Margaret Powel's equal.

Tom Polglaze, however, loved the fair teacher not a whit less than his rival, but he was formed in a rougher mould. He scarcely noticed the change in Tregear; but, if he did not, Margaret Powel did, and she was highly gratified by it.

"Joseph," said she to him one evening when he came to ask her to take a walk, "you seem much changed lately; you are as little like a native of Tremont as myself."

"In what way, Margaret?"

"You have lost that twang, and you seem to know something about the great world. Do you study?"

"Yes; I sit up every night to read, or to work mathematics"

"Why? What do you want to be? A clerk?"

"Margaret, I study only to be more like you; I love you—will you—"

"There, Joseph Tregear, you study to be like me? I am sure I never set you the example of talking such rubbish. Ah, ah!-Good-bye!"

So saying, off she tripped into the house, to his intense discomfiture.

But was Margaret any the more happy than the lover she had left so disconsolate in the street? That evening her parents noticed a great change in her, but could not discover the cause. She did not talk, nor take any food, but soon retired to her own little room, complaining of a headache.

"Do I love him?" she muttered when alone. "Poor fellow! he studies hard for my sake—to be more worthy of me, I suppose he calls it. Ah, Joseph! why did I leave you so abruptly? What a giddy, worthless thing I am!" That night she could not sleep until she had decided upon a future course of action.

The next day, being Saturday, Margaret spent at home in household cares, which she shared with her mother, but she scarcely spoke a word all day. In the evening she went to the draper's and bought a few ribbons and other little articles, for there was some object now in being pretty.

On Sunday she appeared in church dressed with more than her usual care, and she may be forgiven if she was not quite so attentive to the sermon as she should have been, for there at a distance sat Joseph Tregar, looking at her with his great blue eyes, making her blush, and inspiring her with the desire of sinking through the floor.
